TIME'S REVENGES.

UNPLEASANT RECOLLECTIONS OF PRESIDENT GARFIELD'S RECORD.
 Time, the Great Leveler, Brings All Things Even—Gen. Garfield's Extraordinary Duplicity, as Revealed by a Contrast of His Own Letters.
 The worst service that could have been done to the memory of Gen. Garfield was to revive the discussion of his relations with Gen. Rosecrans, whose chief of staff he was when that fine soldier commanded the Army of the Cumberland. The statement was made a long while ago, that Rosecrans's removal from his command was due to Garfield's influence, but both of them denied this, and when the subject was recalled by Blaine's eulogium, Gen. Rosecrans was rather disposed to defend Garfield from the assumption of mediocrity, and quoted a letter, in which Garfield wrote to him long before: "I have never been untrue to you in thought, word or deed, Dana, or any other liar, to the contrary notwithstanding." The publication of this single sentence may have been well meant, but it has been the occasion of disclosures, which the best friends and eulogists of the late President will find it difficult to deny or explain. The following leading editorial from the Administration organ at Washington tells the whole story:

[From the National Republican, March 10.]
 GEN. GARFIELD AND GEN. ROSECRANS.
 It pleased Mr. Blaine, as the eulogist of the late President Garfield, to wound the sensibilities of Gen. Rosecrans in the reference he made to the military career of the subject of his oration. Gen. Rosecrans made a brief statement in reply through the press. On Wednesday last the New York Sun published what purported to be a confidential letter from Gen. Garfield to Secretary Chase, dated July 27, 1863, in which Gen. Rosecrans was charged over and over again with lacking both patriotic zeal and in soldierly ability. It seemed impossible that such a letter could be genuine, and for that reason were refrained from publishing it. Our reasons for doubting it were, first, that Gen. Garfield was at the date of the letter the chief of Gen. Rosecrans's staff, and such secret assaults upon his chief to a powerful member of the Cabinet (or to any one else) would have seemed a breach of faith and a violation of duty; and, second, that Gen. Garfield had on the 17th of February, 1864, from his place on the floor of the House of Representatives, made a speech warmly defending Gen. Rosecrans from just such reflections as were contained in the alleged letter. But this letter to Mr. Chase has now been three days before the public without denial or question of its genuineness from any quarter. We therefore reproduce it entire:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE CUM'D
 Nashville, July 27, 1863.
 My Dear Governor:
 I have for a long time wanted to write to you, not only to acknowledge your last letter, but also to say some things confidentially about the matters in this department; but I have refrained hitherto lest I do injustice to a good man and say to you things which were better left unsaid. We have now, however, reached a point upon which I feel it proper, and also due to that kind opinion which I believe you have had of me, to acquaint you with the condition of affairs here.

I can not conceal from you the fact that I have been greatly tried and dissatisfied with the slow progress we have made in this department since the battle of Stone River. I will say in the outset that it would be in the highest degree unjust to say that the 102 days which elapsed between the battle of Stone River and the next advance of this army were spent in idleness or trifling.

During that period was performed the enormous and highly important labor of reorganizing the Army of the Cumberland what it is in many respects by far the best the country has ever known. But for many weeks prior to our late movement I could not but feel that there was not that live and earnest determination to bring the weight of this army into the scale and make its power felt in crushing the shell of the rebellion.

I have no words to tell you with how much anxiety and solicitude I waited and pleaded for a strong and steady body, not justly say we were in proper condition to advance till the early days of May. At that time the strings began to draw sharply upon the rebels, both on the right and the left. The East began to fear for the safety of Vicksburg, and before the middle of May they began quietly to draw away forces to aid Pemberton. I pleaded for an advance, but not till June began did Gen. Rosecrans begin seriously to meditate a movement.

The army had grown anxious, with the exception of its leading generals, who seemed blind to the advantages of the hour. In the first week of the month a council of war was called, and out of eighteen generals whose opinions were asked, seventeen were opposed to an advance.

I was the only one who urged upon the general the imperative necessity of striking a blow at once, while Bragg was weaker, and we stronger than ever before. I wrote a careful review of the opinions of the generals, and exhibited the fact, gathered from ample data, that we were in a position to strike a blow and sabre against Bragg's 40,000, allowing the most liberal estimate of his force.

love every bone in his body, and, next to my desire to see the rebellion crushed, I desire to see him blessed. But even the breadth of love is not sufficient to cover this almost fatal delay. My personal relations here I would not share, all that I could desire is that I should share his councils and responsibilities even more than I desire, but I beg you to know that this delay is against my judgment and my every wish. Pleasant as are my relations here I would not share his councils and responsibilities even more than I desire, but I beg you to know that this delay is against my judgment and my every wish. Pleasant as are my relations here I would not share his councils and responsibilities even more than I desire, but I beg you to know that this delay is against my judgment and my every wish.

What Gen. Rosecrans says now. Being interviewed about the letter to Secretary Chase, Gen. Rosecrans says Gen. Garfield "possibly and probably did" write the letter in question, and regrets that it was ever written though it would be better that it had never been written. Gen. Rosecrans declares "it does discredit the memory of a dead man, because it is a mixture of untruths and misrepresentations." He further says that for a man to hold such a position as that filled by Gen. Garfield to write such a letter "is a piece of the blackest treachery to one who had always given the writer the fullest proofs of his confidence."

HON. S. P. CHASE.
 This was a most injurious letter to be written concerning Gen. Rosecrans by his chief of staff to Mr. Lincoln, secretary of the treasury. It is charged therein that there was not on the part of the General "that live and earnest determination to bring the great weight of this army into the scale and make its power felt in crushing the shell of the rebellion;" the writer represents himself as sitting with "a restive and unsteady spirit" and pleading for the "striking of a sturdy blow." Thus far, he says, the General has been singularly deficient in his duties as secretary of the treasury. It is charged therein that there was not on the part of the General "that live and earnest determination to bring the great weight of this army into the scale and make its power felt in crushing the shell of the rebellion;" the writer represents himself as sitting with "a restive and unsteady spirit" and pleading for the "striking of a sturdy blow."

A QUEER STORY goes that in 1838, shortly after Gen. Rosecrans had been removed, the late F. P. Blair, Sr., gave a dinner in Washington to his son, F. P. Blair, Jr., then just from the victorious field of Vicksburg, at which were present, among others, Montgomery Blair and General Garfield, then just elected to Congress. At this dinner the subject of Gen. Rosecrans's removal was freely discussed, and there was a general expression of opinion that his removal was a grave mistake. By no one was this expression more forcibly stated than by Gen. Garfield, who was loud in his praises of him as a military genius and able general. Montgomery Blair was so much impressed by Gen. Garfield's statement of the case that he went to President Lincoln and used about the following argument: "Mr. President, I do not want to seem officious, but I was so forcibly impressed by a conversation I had last evening with a young member of Congress from Ohio, who previous to his election was Gen. Rosecrans's chief of staff, that I have come to you as a matter of duty to say that I think Gen. Rosecrans's removal was a grave mistake. The gentleman referred to impressed me so favorably as to his own military ability and the positiveness of his declarations, that I am fully convinced of his knowledge and judgment in the matter."

"Who is this gentleman?" the President is reported to have inquired.
 "Gen. Garfield," replied Mr. Blair.
 "Gen. Garfield? Why, it was upon his statement of facts and representations more than any other that his removal was based," said Mr. Lincoln, with an expression of surprise.
 "It is curing everybody," writes a druggist. "Kidney Wort is the most popular medicine ever known by right, but no other medicine has such specific action on the liver, bowels and kidneys. It puts those symptoms which indicate the presence of kidney disease do not fail to procure it and use faithfully. In liquid or dry form it is sold by all druggists—see last city Tribune."

forwarded Gen. Rosecrans a very feeling dispatch, asking him to be present. On this occasion Charles A. Dana was there. The article mentioned was signed "C. A. D." and held Gen. Garfield up as the party responsible for Gen. Rosecrans's removal. The latter sent a clipping of the same to Gen. Garfield in a letter and informed him as he was then in the midst of a fight for a senatorship, to let the matter remain undisturbed until that was over, when he thought it would be proper time for Garfield to deny the numerous lies that had been circulated. He (Rosecrans) thus showed that he still had unlimited faith in his supposed friend, Garfield, and was willing to embarrass him by even asking a vindication from the slanderer.

What Gen. Rosecrans says now. Being interviewed about the letter to Secretary Chase, Gen. Rosecrans says Gen. Garfield "possibly and probably did" write the letter in question, and regrets that it was ever written though it would be better that it had never been written. Gen. Cotton Seed Meal.
 I HAVE JUST RECEIVED a shipment of Cotton Seed Meal from the Charleston Mills. It is a valuable food for stock as well as a fine fertilizer. It contains 51 per cent of pure protein. It is sold in large lots for export, and in small lots for local use. It is the best meal for stock ever produced. Call
