A GRAMERCY SOCIABLE. A New York letter writer states that Hon. Samuel J. Tilden is to have a grand housewarming after the election at his Gramercy Park residence, the avowed object of the warming being to bring Mr. Tilden's friends together and show off the cosy nest that Mr. T. has fixed up for his old age, upon which he has just expended about a quarter of a million dollars. object of this sociable is to bring together prominent Democratic politicians, friends of Mr. Tilden as well as those who have been estranged from him, with a view to consulting over the old ticket and giving it a joint boom for the next race. The programme in view is said to be to make the frauds of '76 the issue for the next campaign, thus eliminating the tariff question, which the New York Democracy, especially, with the present uncertainties, do not eare to make a prominent feature in the coming campaign. The writer concurrence of Governor Cleveland, August Belmont, John Kelly, and the entire city delegation in congress. Like the numerous other rumors about Mr. Tilden, there may be foundation for this last one or there may not, but we have never been able to settle down to the conviction that Mr. Tilden has entirely abandoned all dreams of the Presidency, notwithstanding the oft repeated assertions to the contrary. His election to the Presidency under the circumstances would be one of the grandest vindications and one of the grandest tributes ever paid to any man by the this, and there is enough of human be indifferent to it. But he does not wish to figure in the role of one seeking the nomination, which his friends tell him will come without seeking if he but say the word. In addition to this it is unquestionably true that Mr. Tilden has a strong following, and that he is regarded by many Democrats in and outside of New York as the most available candi-

While we believe that there are strong points in Tilden, we also believe that the Democratic party has within its lines men who are as strong, if not stronger, before the people, and we believe, moreover, worked, say 56 hours per week, and people, and we believe, moreover, that any of these men can be elected if the tariff question be so judiciously United States, the weight per spindle managed as not to become a distracting element in the party. It is the one thing we have to dread, and it must be handled with care and skill.

Last Wednesday was North Carolina day at the Boston Exposition. Mr. Edward Atkinson, in response to an invitation, made a speech, in which he expressed his surprise at the great resources of this State, and predicted a splendid future for her. He was followed by ex-United States Senator Poole, who gave an interesting statement of the resources of the State, agricultural, mineral and others, and pointed out the advantages it presented to labor and capital, after which Col. Pardee, of Connecticut, who has spent considerable time in this State and travelled over much of it, gave a glowing account of his observations, and advised farmers and eapitalists to turn their steps towards North Carolina, where all the conditions were favorable, where all could find fertile lands for the plow, and openings for profitable investment.

in a letter says that Mr. Tilden having declined to permit the use of his the British cotton factories have not name as a candidate for the Presidency, Governor elect Hoadly, of Ohio, is the man for the Democrats to nominate. He grows enthusiastic over him thus: "With genius, common sense, great experience in affairs, bold, individual and magnetic, altogether of such stuff as heroes are made of, let Hoadly be our nominee for President in 1884, and the Republicans will go."

The political campaign is getting lively in Pennsylvania. Chairman Cooper, of the Republican executive committee, says the contest will be close but the Republicans will carry the State, while Chairman Hensel, of the Democratic committee, says the Democratic pole will knock the per-

It was inevitable that the infant industries of the continent and America would grow and develop, and that their growth would be greatly enhanced by the continued improvement and increased means of communication between cotton-growing countries and the rest of the world. The Economist says that, in spite of all the advantages which, in consequence of this improvement, have inured to the competitors of Great Britain, that country, with a comparatively small population, has increased its consumption—taking the increase in the number of bales as the measure—to about the same ex-tent as the whole continent of Europe, and to a considerable larger extent than the United States, notwithstand-American people. Mr. Tilden knows ing all our facilities for production, our nearness to the raw material and nature and ambition in him not to Moreover, it is said in comparing the respective amounts of cotton con-sumed weight of bales is not the only criterion of trade progress and pros-

At the recent meeting of the British Association Mr. Edwin Guthrie read

a paper on the position and prospects of the cotton trade, of which the London Economist prints a synopsis with remarks. In the course of his paper Mr. Guthrie dwelt upon the increase in the production and consumption of this important staple during recent years, and indicated the chief factors which have influenthe chief factors which have influen-ced international competition in the high-toned a gentleman has been trade in the past, and which are mentioned, one that is strictly thorlikely to influence it in the future. He also presented some interesting comparative tables, the meaning of which we give below. Dealing first weights to carry, never having been with the growth of the industry, Mr. Guthrie shows that during the last forty years or so it has undergone an enormous development. In the five years ended 1840 the average annual | work for our cause. The war closed, consumption of cotton was 1,014,000 he rode his own purchased horse bales of 400 pounds each, while for a home, hitched him to a plow, took like period ending in 1880 the average hold of the handles and made a crop. consumption was 3,137,000 bales, and in the two years 1881-2 it reached an his energies in developing the iron average of 3,626,000 bales. The in- resources of the State. crease in production has also been very rapid in other countries. Thus some of the railroad syndicates have the continent of Europe in 1836-40 not taken him as their president, for took an average of 521,000 bales, and | there is not a better man anywhere

Mr. Guthrie, however, shows that in such a case as this a comparison of percentages of growth is necessarily fallacious, the greater ratios shown by the continent and the United States being mainly due to the fact that they started from a lower basis. Calculating by number of bales, the United States being mainly due to the fact that they started from a lower basis. increase of 2,600,000, against about the same amount in continental countries and 1,900,000 bales in the perity; the quantity and value of the product must be taken into consideration. Mr. Guthrie shows that the average weight spun per spindle in Great Britain last year was 35 3 4 pounds, while on the continent it was 57 pounds, and in the United States it reached 74 pounds per spindle, in-dicating that while other countries requiring a greater supply of raw material, Great Britain is doing a finer trade, requiring less weight of raw material. He also shows that are doing more of the course trade, reducing these respective weights per taking the average weekly running time on the continent and in the would be 35 3-4, 45 1-2 and 59 3-4 respectively. Speaking of the question of foreign competition, the Economist says that, all things considered, the United Kingdom has little reason to be dissatisfied with the way in which it has thus far held its own against foreign competition. When, however, the further questions as to the probability of continuing to keep pace with foreign competitors, and the measures which should be taken to enlarge Great Britain's trade and make it more profitable, come to be considered very divergent views are found to be entertained. The Economist says that doubtless the main factor which will determine the future course of trade will be the cost of production. Mr. Guthrie thinks that in respect to hours of labor rival British producers have an an advantage, and he is evidently of the opinion that the factory acts have been a wistake. He admits that "for every farthing a pound we are handicapped in the cost of labor we are handicapped perhaps from 5 to 10 farthings by foreign tariffs;" "but," he very plausibly argues, that "the latter are not in British control, while the former is, and to a large extent the difference of a farthing a pound on yarn makes all the difference be-tween free sales and no trade at all." The Economist maintains at some length that shorter hours of labor in afforded foreign competitors any advantage in neutral waters, and does not agree with Mr. Guthrie that the present depressed state of the cotton trade is attributable to the factory acts. It, nevertheless, coincides with his view that the policy of restricting the output would be suicidal to the interests of the trade. Mr. Guthrie's argument on this point is an elabora-

We have this year what we have lacked in previous campaigns—a complete enrollment of those who favor our principles in this State. We have been busy on this all through the year, and now we know just where our strength lies, and we can handle it well. We indorse no outside candidate unless he is unreservedly pledged to total prohibition.
