HOW WILL THEY DO IT?

John Sherman and his little man Foraker are apparently having a good time in running the bloody shirt business. John says if the rights of his colored friend in the Southern States to the free exercise of the ballot continue to be ignored (he takes it for granted, as it suits his purpose, that they are ignored), then Southern representation in Congress and in the electoral college based on the colored population will be reduced, we suppose, though he don't say it, to a strictly white basis. But in undertaking a little game of this kind Mr. Sherman will find himself mixed up in some very entangling entanglements. There was a time in the halcyon days of the Republican party when it carried through Congress any legislation it saw fit bearing upon the South, and if there was no warrant for it under the constitution, as there was not for any of those so-called reconstruction measures and much of the legislation which followed, they cavalierly disposed of the difficulty by proclaiming with Thad Stevens that they were "extra constitutional." Perhaps when Mr. Sherman proceeds to move on his proposed line some one will suggest to him that the day of extra constitutional legislation has passed by, and that he had better proceed with a reasonable amount of deliberation and slowness. He will find himself attempting to perform with an elephantine Jumbo too big for his tent. The fifteenth amendment to the constitution, the only one under which he could have any pretense for action, provides that when any State refuses the right of suffrage to colored citizens on account of their color, the basis of representation may be reduced, but it will devolve upon him to show where the State does this, which will be a difficult feat for him, as no Southern State has done or intends to do it. There is no statute of any Southern State which discriminates against any class of citizens or deprives any of the ballot except on conviction for certain crimes, which provisions apply to white as well as, to black. What Mr. Sherman and his clackers propose in this line they will have to do outside of the constitution, and right there they will run against rocks that they will find some difficulty in steering through.

Mr. Foraker is a younger man than Sherman. He is brasher, not so cold blooded nor so cool-headed. There is less method in his howlings. He declared in a speech he made in a New York town that the men who carried bayonets to secure the rights of the negroes would again take up bayonets if necessary and march to see those rights secured. Why, bless his soul, the men who fought in the Federal army never dreamed of negro suffrage. They were told that they were fighting simply for the Union, and that was how thousands of Democrats, while Republicans were behind bomb-proofs or buying substitutes, were induced to go into the army and give their support to the war. It was not until after the war, until after the South had laid down her arms and her soldiers and the Federal soldiers had returned to their homes and engaged in the avocations of peace that the plotting Republican politicians conceived the idea of springing the negro suffrage question, as a means of holding the South in partisan subjection. If they had attempted it before the war closed, when the armies still confronted each other, it would have been impossible to keep a Federal army in the field and the South would today be an independent government. Mr. Foraker, with all his bombast, forgets that when he talks about taking up arms again the cry would not be to save the Union, but to save the Republican party by securing to it the Southern negro vote, a job in which Northern Democrats would not be apt to take a very large part. In such a crusade the Republicans would have it all to themselves, and Mr. Foraker would find himself lonely for want of much company, entirely too lonely to be cheerful. But we apprehend that Mr. Foraker, fresh in his enthusiasm from an unexpected victory in Ohio, was talking without due reflection and indulging in nonsense that in cooler moments would not have escaped his lips.

The latest reports from Ohio make the joint Republican majority in the legislature not over three and some as low as one. Some of the Republican members are said to be opposed to Sherman's re-election. It would be delightful to see the old reptile laid out in his own household.

The factional fight in Maryland continues lively. In the meantime the Baltimore Sun publishes the cards, speeches, &c., of the respective sides as advertisements at so much a column and rakes in the cash. It is interesting, if not funny, for the Sun.

The Holston conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, at Chattanooga, Monday, declined to change the name by omitting the word South by a vote of 119 to 1.

Gov.-elect Foraker, of Ohio, made a speech for Wise at Staunton, Va., Monday. The speech was very conciliatory and didn't abound in the bloody shirt.

The New York World keeps pegging away at Secretary Bayard, whom it characterizes as "Mr. Cleveland's evil genius."

A PUEBLO BELLE.

The Way a New Mexico Indian Girl Dresses Up.

Louisville Courier-Journal Correspondence. We felt ourselves in luck one day when we heard that a large party of Indians were in town. They were of the friendly tribe of Pueblos, which make and sell many curious images of possible gods, devils, etc., in their ugly looking eastern pottery. They were evidently decked out in all the red and yellow that the tribe could muster, and had their faces ornamented with bright patches of red paint, and a handkerchief or so twisted through their long black hair. One of the dusky maidens we called the "belle of the tribe," as her costume seemed a little more stylish and aesthetic than the rest, and she herself appeared so perfectly satisfied with her appearance.

Her short dress reached barely to her knees, giving an obstructed view of her long buckskin leggings, and a red piece of calico was gracefully thrown over her shoulders to answer the purpose of a shawl, in lieu of a better. Her "bangs" were marvelous, and hung over her forehead so low as to almost conceal her eyes, which peered out curiously on the world from behind this straight, black mass. She and I met face to face, and with souls above the conventionalities of social etiquette, stood quite still to take a good look at each other. I saw a look of most intense disgust light up her countenance as she took in the details of my plain tailor made dress, then, with a sweeping and approving glance downward at her own irreproachable costume, she passed on, as much as to say: "Such horrible bad taste!"

Sarah Althea's Plans.

A San Francisco dispatch says: "Sarah Althea Hill, who will soon make her debut on the stage as Portia, will be billed as Mrs. William Sharon, the decision of Judge Sullivan in the divorce having given her a legal right to the ex-Senator's name. She proposes to play six nights a week and lecture on Sundays. She is having her celebrated case against Sharon dramatized and will produce it about Jan. 1st. If the plot is faith fully followed it will put the indecencies of the French Stage to the blush. Mrs. Sharon says she will travel and live in a special car. In the meantime the aged defendant, whose attorneys are becoming enriched, is very sick at the Palace Hotel with an attack of malaria. Should he die the prospects of his alleged wife would be much improved for the heirs, among whom is the wife of Sir Thomas Hesketh, would be likely to end the malodorous case by a compromise."
