JUDGE KELLY'S BITTER SPEECH.

Parliamentary Tactics Which Redound to the Advantage of the Democratic Party—Holman in the Breach—Other Matters.

Correspondence of THE OBSERVER.

WASHINGTON, June 11.—I shall not attempt to put together the proceedings today on the resolutions of Judge Kelley to expunge General Wheeler's speech from the Congressional Record. The Associated Press will give a full and corrected account of the whole. I merely desire to comment on one or two features of the very peculiar discussion which took place. In the first place, we had Judge Kelly, the personal friend of Stanton, making the most vituperative speech I have heard in the House. Then we had two Western Republicans, Hepburn and Anderson, rising, and with great indignation repudiating some of the statements of the great Pennsylvania protectionist. We had also the Democratic leader, Morrison, taking the accused man, Wheeler off the floor without opportunity for reply to Kelly's assault on his character, and Speaker Carlisle ruling so as to keep him off. The reference of the resolutions offered by Kelly to the committee on rules was a stroke of policy undoubtedly. It gets rid of an unwelcome matter. As regards the expunging resolutions themselves, it must be admitted that they have no ground on which to stand. The committee will, of course, so report. The question of whether Wheeler should have made the speech, and the question whether he had the parliamentary right to make it, are very different. The admission of Hepburn and Anderson show that even Republican prejudice was not sufficient to blink the facts in justice to the matter. Some of the Republicans are, however, anxious to have the untimely speech circulated. As to the speech itself, it is chock full of truth, and in the end that cannot hurt, North or South. Upon the whole the case did not go against the Democrats, although General Wheeler did all he could, innocently of course, to get his party into a Libonian bog.

While Mr. Holman was discussing the general features of the legislative bill he was pelted with questions by both Democrats and Republicans as to the purpose of the amendment relating to the civil service. The scene was animated for a few moments. Holman denied what is commonly understood to be the purpose of the amendment, but admitted that it might have the effect charged—namely, to put Democrats in office. The debate is likely to last out a week. It is understood that the amendment will be ruled out of order and it is stated that the appointment of Blount as chairman of the committee of the whole instead of Springer, was a part of the programme. It is known that the latter would have ruled favorably. The whole scheme is unworthy of the committee from which it emanated. The only thing that could be gained by adopting the amendment would be to place the Democratic party in an awkward plight before the country.

The Senate is discussing Senator Butler's naval cadet bill. Senator Ransom has returned. Judge McRae, of Fayetteville, is here. Mr. E. S. Warrock, formerly of Wilmington, and more lately of Yancey county, is in the city. During Judge Kelly's reading of Stanton's long letter this morning Judge Bennett delivered an able yarn which punctuated the performance perfectly.

Senator Blackburn and Representative Holman say it will be the middle of August before Congress adjourns.

MR. BUTLER'S PROPHECY.

He Believes Taxation Will Force Another Sectional Struggle.

PHILADELPHIA, June 10.—Gen. B. F. Butler today expressed himself at some length to the World's correspondent on the general political outlook. He branded civil service as a sham and thought the Democrats in Congress showed a lamentable want of cohesion. He believed the next Presidential campaign will be fought as the last was, on the character of candidates and the scramble for spoils. There will, he thinks, be no third organization of consequence, as both sides will bid for the labor vote. Taking what he called a long range view of things he expressed the idea that the great preponderance of the South in national councils would eventually produce discord again, but just when no man could say. He referred specially to the fact that while the South pays but one-fifth of the taxes she dominates the Presidency, the lower House, and will soon secure the Senate, all on a system of representation based on a supposed negro vote. Trouble will come some day he believes, when the South tries to use this power to coerce the North into payment of Southern losses during the war. The conflict may not be of the sword, but will certainly be a business one bred of taxation.

A Thousand Dollar Speech.

Robert P. Porter, who was a member of the Tariff Commission and is known as a tariff writer, has put a New York statesman in a hole by telling his friends that he received $1,000 for writing him a short tariff speech. The statesman is Congressman Elstein and the speech is not so remarkable but that any bright writer could have prepared its equal in an hour.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Sensation Over a False Report of His Death—Preparing to Speak in England.

NEW YORK, June 10.—Henry Ward Beecher receives many calls. The visitors were many, and they came to see whether he was dead or not. A rumor had spread that apoplexy had suddenly killed him with a single stroke. The source of the false news is undiscoverable, but it doubtless lies in the fact that the pastor of Plymouth has been compelled to begin a long vacation at once instead of waiting until July, as usual. The report did not get into print; but it had wide circulation by word of mouth. Beecher was jolly over it. He opened the door of his house in person to most of the callers in order, as he laughingly explained, to shock them with disappointment. Mrs. Beecher, often followed him into the hall to see and enjoy the pleasure of the friends as they viewed him alive and roscate. They were invited in. On his library desk a bottle of port wine was kept unstoppered most of the time, because many of the visitors accepted his suggestion that they drink long life to him. He drank none himself, however, though he received the toasts in smiling attention. "You is my tipple," he said. "I occasionally take a glass of Rhine wine or claret, but port has too much body in it. It would strengthen me. That isn't what I want. The fact is, I have too much health, too abundant blood, too much robustness. That is the trouble with me."

Beecher's sons were among the earliest inquirers, for the rumor of their father's death had reached them promptly. Deacon Howard, his most intimate church friend, hugged him impulsively, and exclaimed: "I knew well enough you were not dead, for I'm sure I'd have dropped dead at the same time."

Deacon S. V. White, the Wall street speculator, took a cab and drove to Beecher's house. He stopped the vehicle for moving swifter than the city ordinance permits. "White, old fellow," exclaimed Beecher, on being congratulated by him on being alive, "I'm only partial to you, because I've been politically dead since last fall." This was a jocular allusion to a rather sharp remark by White in a speech at Beecher having politically killed himself by bolting James G. Blaine. Women were plenty in this informal reception, and one of them imprinted a kiss on his left cheek, low down among the creases, but she was a stout matron of fifty, and a crony of Mrs. Beecher's. Newspaper reporters were numerous, too, and Beecher welcomed them with good humored jest. "You come to my funeral as earnestly as you went to Brother Cleveland's," he said to several who arrived in company. "But when I die I shall be so shy as he was about going married. I am not modest. You journalists have never encountered me. To one reporter who had known and reported him many years, he said: "Inevitably, your job of stenographing my services will be wrong in my expressions, no doubt, and many things I have changed my mind, but I have never been insincere."

Mr. Beecher is seriously ill, and he will preach next Sunday at a firm belief will be his last sermon in Plymouth church. He expects to die of an apoplectic stroke before long. That has been his conviction for a year and he has talked of it to his intimate friends repeatedly. In so thinking he has been influenced by his physical temperament, his failing health, his old age and his family tendencies. In conversation on the subject he has been cool, calm and cheerful, but utterly hopeless of surviving the year. Deacon John Howard, his closest personal friend, and constant companion, recently called a meeting of Plymouth church deacons and spoke to them of the pastor's feebleness. It had been Mr. Beecher's annual custom to continue preaching until the end of July, and then take a vacation extending well into September, on account of a rheumatism which he had contracted in the occurrence of his fever early in the autumn. But deacon Howard represented that the venerable clergyman would have to stop work at once or break down at it. His naturally strong constitution was gradually giving away to age's infirmities and premonitions of apoplexy were manifest. The deacons voted unanimously that a vacation ought begin at once, and that in October, the trustees, in whom the power really rests, have now agreed to that proposition, and last evening the matter was laid before the congregation for approval. Mr. Beecher has a decided objection to the plan, and is accompanied by his wife. He hopes that Gladstone will appeal to the voters of England in an election for indorsement of his home rule for Ireland policy, in which he will take the stump for him. His advisers advise him to do no speaking abroad, but to rest entirely, but he says that political oratory in England would be reprobation, and he has already written to Gladstone, with whom he has been 30 years been in occasional correspondence, tendering his services, should they be desired. He thinks that such employment would help, rather than hinder him in his health, and he is thought to be anxious to make his mark once more as an orator before he dies.

A DEED OF DEVILS

A WRECK ON THE CENTRAL ROAD AT ROGERS.

Devilish Ingenuity of the Wretches That Planned the Fatal Work—Indescribable Suffering of Fireman Maddox—"For God's Sake Kill Me!"

The Savannah News of Wednesday gives at length the shocking details of the accident on the Central railroad, at Rogers, eighty-five miles west of Savannah, by which Fireman Maddox was killed and Engineer Prendergast seriously injured. The accident was caused by obstructions placed upon the track by some unknown hands for the purpose of wrecking the train, in which horrible design they unfortunately succeeded. The devilish ingenuity of the wretches is shown by the device they adopted to cause the wreck. An examination of the track where the wreck occurred revealed one of the most carefully and successfully planned jobs of train wrecking that has ever been known. A block of hard wood was found wedged in the "frog" of the switch, between the rails and even with the top so that it would not be seen. It was placed so that the flange of the engine wheels, when they struck it, could not drive it out, but would wedge it in tighter. The switch is just beyond a curve, and the track can be seen by the engineer but a short distance ahead. The train wrecked was the night express which left Atlanta Monday with six cars—two express cars, day coach, smoker, and the baggage, express and mail cars, in charge of Conductor W. H. Beebe. The night was very dark and the widest excitement prevailed. The tender telescoped the cab, crushing the fireman against the boiler. The lever was thrown forward and penetrated his body, cutting him almost in two. The baggage, mail and express cars drove the six of cutting away from the engine. The conductor and the smoker were dragged from their tracks. The forward car, next to the engine, was thrown across the track and piled upon the locomotive. Both the engineer and fireman were held fast under the wreck. The engine lay under the tender. One leg was fast under an iron rod. The fireman was crushed against the boiler. One foot was cut off and his body below his chest was almost split in two by the iron lever. Neither the two could be released until help arrived, and it was two hours before that came.

"FOR GOD'S SAKE KILL ME."

As soon as the rescue train reached the wreck the wretches of cutting away the express car began. The conductor was lying on his side with one foot wedged against the hot boiler. The flesh was cooked to the bone and was almost ready to drop in pieces. A heavy iron rod lay across his right leg. Until this was cut away nothing could be done. Suffering with pain the heroic engineer held the switch against the rod until it was cut in two. The groans of the fireman were heard from the rear sleeper. As he lay pinned against the hot boiler with the fear of iron crushed through his body he begged to be killed. "For God's sake kill me. Kill me and put me out of this misery," he cried, "I can't live." He did not lose consciousness for a moment. As soon as the doctor arrived chloroform was administered, but its effect was only temporary. As soon as he recovered from its influence he begged again to be killed. The men were at work all the time cutting away the wreck. A few minutes before he was released Maddox turned to one whom he knew and said: "It can't last much longer, old boy, I'm about done." He was again pinned against the hot boiler with the fear of iron crushed through his body he begged to be killed. "For God's sake kill me. Kill me and put me out of this misery," he cried, "I can't live." He did not lose consciousness for a moment. As soon as the doctor arrived chloroform was administered, but its effect was only temporary. As soon as he recovered from its influence he begged again to be killed. The men were at work all the time cutting away the wreck. A few minutes before he was released Maddox turned to one whom he knew and said: "It can't last much longer, old boy, I'm about done." He was again pinned against the hot boiler with the fear of iron crushed through his body he begged to be killed. "For God's sake kill me. Kill me and put me out of this misery," he cried, "I can't live." He did not lose consciousness for a moment.
