PIXIES TOLD OF TREASURE. Superstitions Cornishman Digging for the Buried Gold.

CHARTOTTE DATES OBSERVER SEPTEMBER 5, 1906.

London Chronicle. Superstitious beliefs still linger in the remote villages of Cornwall, and the tenacity with which many of the Cornish folk cling to them is strikingly illustrated by a remarkable story of a search for hidden treasure, which omes from Wendron. Nearly half a century age an old lady named Varker lived in a cot-tage at Lower Bodily, in the parish of Wendron, whwich had the reputation of being haunted by ghosts. One night she declared that two pixies had paid her a visit and told her that vast treasure was hidden beneath the cottage.

With the reputation which the humble dwelling had for being haunted, the story was received with considerable credence in the district. it made such an impression on her two sons that they immediately com-menced to excavate for the treasure. Taking up the floor of one of the rooms, they sank a shaft to the depth of several fathoms. Water in-vaded the shaft and pumps and other appliances were erected for draining and hauling. The premature death of one of the brothers led to the abandonment of the operations with-Now, after the lapse of forty years, the search for the supposed hidden treasure has been resumed by W. H. Varker, a resident of Goldsithney, Varker, a resident of Goldsithney, and grandson of the old lady who held communication with the pixies. In the interval the cottage has been demolished, but Mr. Varker has demolished, but Mr. Varker has located the site, and with the help of another man from the neighborhood, is engaged in sinking a shaft. The excavations siready extend to a depth of 24 feet, of which 17 feet s vertical and the remainder on an incline. Pumps and machinery are in course of erection and the explorer is sanguine of success. Some of the older folk in the district entertain the belief that the cottage marked the site of a smugglers' den and that the sinking of the shaft will lead to the discovery of under-ground passages.
