Headquarters of Postal Company to be Moved to Richmond.
 Within the next few days the headquarters of Superintendent G. W. Ribble, of the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, will be removed from Washington to Richmond. This decision has recently been reached. The reason for the change is the constantly increasing business of the company in Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina, which are in Mr. Ribble's territory. More efficient service is expected to be given by the securing of headquarters which are more centrally located.

BEN GREET AS MALVOLLO.

First "Star" to Assume This Role—It's Dramatic Possibilities—Justification of Shakespeare's Treatment of Malvolvo—Adaptation of Play to Out-Door Representation.

Of the many parts taken by Ben Greet in his Shakespearean plays none have proved a greater success or have had a wider popularity than his assumption of the role of Malvolvo. It has been a matter of surprise to many that in the presentation of "Twelfth Night" on the campus of Elizabeth College next Monday night the leader of this English company will not impersonate the character of Viola, hitherto considered the star-role of the comedy. Ben Greet was indeed, the first Shakespearean actor of high rank to perceive the dramatic possibilities in Malvolvo, and his success in this capacity has so approved his judgment that his example has been followed by Southern.

While Viola is only one of Shakespeare's many charming heroines, who, disguised in male attire, "have never told their love," but "sat like patience on a monument, smiling at grief," Malvolvo is unique as a study of unconscious egotism. His like has never before been seen. And it is largely from the fact that the egotism of this over-weening steward is unconscious of itself that the humor of the situation springs. In depicting this centering of individual interests, at the same time contrasting it with larger interests; above all, in making this personality, in its self-importance, unaware of its real insignificance—herein lies the skill of the artist, actor. Again, to represent a character "Sick of self-love," as Malvolvo is described by Olivia, in such a way as not to exaggerate it beyond the bounds of credibility, yet to (sufficiently) emphasize this weakness, so as to render possible the latter misconception and misinterpretation of the fatuous steward—this is the difficulty which Mr. Ben Greet so cleverly masters.

Shakespeare's treatment of the character of Malvolvo may at first sight appear harsh, and the punishment which he has meted to the servant of Olivia, somewhat merciless; but on the first entrance of the steward, the great dramatist has taken pains to accentuate this quality of self-righteousness which justifies the plot of the three conspirators to bring one, unduly raised in his self-esteem, down to their level. Then, too, the interference of Malvolvo with the mirth of the three revellers together with his needlessly enforced strictures gives a still more plausible reason for this combination against him and we are compelled to cry out with Sir Toby, "Dost thou think, because thou art virtuous, there shall be no more cakes and ale?" When once the plot has been formed, the judgment of each conspirator is confirmed by Malvolvo's imaginary disposition of him, until whatever hesitancy there may have been in the overthrow of this would-be servant-master has been removed.

With its many garden scenes "Twelfth Night" is a play adapted to out-door representation and the setting which will be given it Monday night in a grove on the Elizabeth campus promises to be especially attractive.
