The warehouse owned by J. D. Elliott on Ellis street, which contained paints and oil, was totally destroyed. The building was struck by lightning and set on fire at the beginning of the storm. The fire alarm was at once turned in and the Hickory Fire Company was soon on the Fire Company was soon on the ground, and by their heroic work saved considerable near-by property. The residence of Rev. C. S. Cashwell,

The residence of Rev. C. S. Cashwell, occupied by George R. Wooten, was damaged considerably on the east side next to the warehouse. The effects of the occupants were slightly damaged. The properties were partially covered by insurance.

The wooden storehouse of Rufus Huffman, in the southern portion of the city, was struck, a portion of the weather boarding being torn off. A bureau up stairs in the building was totally destroyed. Those in the building at the time were severely shocked, but not seriously injured. The Hickory Telephone Company suffered considerable loss by the burning out of phones throughout the city.

The Lost Asses An Actual Fact

A certain cruel king sent his servant to look for some lost Asses, promising him the death penalty if they were not found. The servant returned, leading nine men, and said, While I have not found the lost, I have done better. . Here are nine men, who have families, yet they are uninsured. Lo, are they not greater Asses than the ones you have lost?" "Thou art a wise man," answered the King. "Wear my crown and let me sit at thy feet until the sun goes
