The court room itself is still crowded at every session. The fourth day of the trial has seen no diminution in the audience. The holding of right sessions of the court is an evidence of the close at-tention that is being paid to all the details of the case.

Hau remains the centre of attraction. The crowd is showing him a certain ad-miration because of the stout fortitude with which he bears up against the pitiless array of facts pointing to his guilt. Nevertheless, the prisoner evidently is lesing confidence, and the long strain is leginning to tell on his nerves. He no lenger whispers cheerfully to his coun-sel, Herr Dietz, and to day it was clear that his self contained and courageous demeanor was assumed. When he entered the court room this morning his pal-lid face showed deep lines of brooding
