Pertinent Proposition Apropos Police

Reduction. "Did you ever stop to think," re-marked a business man yesterday, "that the members of the police and fire departments of the city per man have more territory to take care of than any other similar sets of men anywhere in the country?

"Roughly estimating. Charlotte is five miles long and four miles broad and has an area of 20 square miles. Figuring 640 acres to the mile, this gives the city an acreage of 12,808. In the police department are 21 men, or an average of one man to every same approximate average holds This, when one considers the blind tigers and other undestraple malefactors, is enough to keep the full force of men busy. But there 21 men are not on duty all the time so far as the police department is concerned. The city therefore is patrolled by 10 men on active duty, which is about one man to every two square miles. And yet the authorities have reduced the force."
