BILL ARP'S LETTER.

Atlanta Constitution.

I was ruminating about the fight. It is common property and everybody has the right to talk about it. Tillman did wrong in jumping over three desks to strike McLaurin. About one desk was the limit of propriety. Three desks gave a man time to cool and that makes it against the law to fight. As to the time and place, that is of no consequence now. There was a time in the days of Webster and Calhoun and Tom Benton and Henry Clay and when the United States Senate was as sacred almost as a church but now a large majority of its members get their jobs by conduct infinitely more disgraceful than fighting. Bribery and corruption have become so common that a man can't get there without using a big pile of money and making lots of promises. Of course, I do not include our Southern Senators, for they haven't got the money. If we had some millionaires in Georgia, Clay and Bacon would have to step down and out. And I am not so much disgusted with Tillman for fighting in the Senate Chamber. He had reasons to believe that his pardner had received promises, and I reckon he had. He certainly had great expectations or he would not have flopped over so suddenly. Politicians have to be paid for their votes.

Tillman is a true man, but he is not a great and good man. I admire him for some traits in his character. He cannot be bribed or intimidated. He dares to say what he believes, and he uses his pitchfork with impunity. He is impetuous and combative, but he is sincere, and everybody admires a sincere man. Sincere is one of the strongest and best words in our language. It literally means unsealed—without wax—for in the olden time letters were sealed with wax, but if they contained no secrets they were not sealed at all, for wax cost money. Tillman is a bold, defiant, stubborn man, but he is not great. A great man like Webster or Calhoun would have said to McLaurin, "Well, sir, if I am a liar, I deserve the epithet. If I am not, then you deserve it, but I shall not stoop to give it." I wish we were all that great. This thing of resenting the charge of lying with a blow is a strange perversion of propriety. A man may gain his ends by cheating, swindling, over reaching, hypocrisy, or concealing the truth, but you must not call him a liar.

He may break all the commandments, but don't call him a liar, though that is not in the Decalogue. All that I regret about the fight is that Spooner did not call Tillman a liar and get mauled for it before McLaurin came in. I want somebody to whip Spooner. He was the teaser that brought on the fight and was delighted that it occurred between the two Carolina Senators. With his party it is no crime to shoot down ten thousand Filipinos who refuse to give up their country, but it shocks them awfully to have a little fracas in the Senate Chamber.

Well, there are some great men and there are many good men, but greatness and goodness are seldom combined. Addison says it takes both to make a man complete. Such, for example, as Washington and Robt. E. Lee. Job says great men are not always wise, and he might have added most of them are mean, selfish, heartless and ambitious. Lord Bacon, for instance, who took bribes while on the bench, and Cromwell and Napoleon. Webster was a great man and long has been my ideal of greatness. He was called the Godlike but sometimes his human nature overcame him. And so with Henry Clay and Bob Toombs. The great weakness of the people is idolatry. Partisan or sectional or religious idolatry. Every man who climbs high up where the people can see him is either a saint or a sinner, according to our politics, our sect, our creed. One man idolizes the character of Lincoln or Grant, another holds both of them in contempt. I suppose that three-fourths of the Northern people pay homage to the memory of John Brown for what they call his good intentions and every northern history and encyclopedia apologizes for him, and even so good a man as McKinley excused himself for not attending the reinterment of his bones, on the ground that the pressure of official duties would not allow him to leave Washington. Most Northern men still denounce John C. Calhoun as the author of secession in Columbia. Here in Georgia this idolatry is already taking shape in our silly burralls for our candidate for governor. But, as usual, the loudest shouters have axes to grind and are diligently laying traps to catch the people. But this is the shady side of politics and I won't ruminate any further about it.

If the ground was dry enough I would work some in the garden and not brood over things that will soon pass away. I thought that spring had come two weeks ago, and I exclaimed, "Hail, gentle spring." But she didn't hail—she only sleeted—and they say that old winter is lingering in her lap—the old rascal. He ought to be ashamed of himself. My best relief and comfort is to play with the grand children. Our little girl of five has had her feelings hurt, and is very indignant at what her Cousin Will said. She told me about it. "Grandpa, I told Cousin Will that when he got to be a man and I got to be a young lady, he must marry me, and what do you think he said?" "I don't know. What did he say?" "Why, he said he would see about it. Wasn't that mean? He ought to be glad to marry me. If he don't mind, I will marry my Cousin Ralph; and then I reckon he won't see about it. He's mean, ain't he, grandpa?" Another chap was saying his prayers the other night and prayed for God to bless grandma and grandpa and Aunt Mary and Cousin John and several others, and then he said: "That's all, Lord. Ain't that all, papa?" "No, you didn't pray for your Cousin Jenny." "No, papa, I won't pray for her, she's mean; I wish God would send a cow to butt her over." All of our little ones are going to school now, and feel their consequence. I'm taking more interest in our public school than I ever did. Our 12 year old, who lives with us, is absorbed in her studies and loves her books and her teacher, and is proud when she gets marked perfect or away up in the nineties. Of course I help her with her sums every night, for some of them are very hard, and sorter strain my old mind. There are fifty-three pupils in her grade (the sixth,) and yesterday forty-six of them had the sums done correctly, and when the teacher asked those who had no help to hold their hands up; no hand was held up. They all had help. That makes forty-seven teachers for one grade, and I am pleased to be one of them. I wish that school teachers of these children could realize how much influence they have over their pupils. The teacher can make the school life of a pupil pleasant or miserable, and I am glad to be lieve that our teachers are conscientious. I have several grandchildren there, and I take note of their progress. The days of old Isham are past. The old man was a stern and rigid disciplinarian. He wore slippers in the school room, and sometimes would slip up behind a boy who was making horses or dogs on his slate and would suddenly smash the boy's face down on the slate and rub the picture out with his nose. He used to have fights with the big boys, and loved to mail obedience into their rebellious souls. And there was Benam and Judge Warner and my father, and Wm. H. Seaward, all yankees, who had to subdue the big boys by hard fighting, and if a teacher couldn't whip a boy and subdue him he was turned off as incompetent. My opinion is that I got most too much whipping when I was a school boy. I still remember how John Norton whipped me on a boat and bursted it, and ran home yelling and my mother cried as she doctored it up and my father made me go back. But John Norton was a good teacher, and he had a hard time with Jim Wilson and Jim Graig and Jim Wardlaw and my brother Jim and Jim Alexander, the doctor who died last fall in Atlanta, and several other Jims. I never knew a boy named Jim who wasn't devilish at school. Verily, there is something in a name, and now Jim Smith is going to run for governor. Better not tell a lie on him, he would jump over forty desks to whip a man.

Headache

kills, not necessarily suddenly, but SURELY. It preys upon the intellectual powers more than we realize. It consumes the vitality faster than nature can replenish it, and we cannot tell just what moment a temporary or complete aberration of the mind will result. Headache and pain should be promptly removed—but properly. Many pain cures are more harmful than the pain. Beware. If you would be safe, take

Dr. Miles' Pain Pills.

"As a result of neuralgia I lost the sight of my right eye, and the pain I have suffered is incomprehensible, being obliged to take opiates almost continually.
