17 year insect is the "Periodical T. W. Boatwright, who has Cicada" (Creada). A species conducted bottling works here very closely related to it is known for almost a year, has disposed as the "Harvest fly," "Dry fly," or of his husiness and good will "July fly" in various sections, and to Buffaloe & Hewitt. This this is more or less abundant ev ery year. This common species is Periodical Cicada is orange col ored and black.

In reality the damage done by the Periodical Cicada is probably during the years when we do not see it than when it appears before us. While it is developing under some plant, but when it emerges to the open air it takes very little if any food and it is a question whether they take any food what ever after emerging. Tueir dam age at this time consists in slitting the twigs of trees, and it is only the females that do this. If this state ment is doubted it can easily be verified by an examination of insects when they appear. On the underside, at the hind end of the body of the female, a spear-like organ will be found, fitted in to a groove in the body. This is the instrument with which she found in the male insects.

But what the males lack in damage to trees, they make good by the shrill noises which they inflict upon our ears, for it is only the males that sing. A rhyme says: "Happy are Cicadas' lives, Since they all have voiceles

And an examination will at least prove the last assertion to be true. On the under side of the body, just behind the last (third) pair of legs, the males have two roundish flaps, one ou each side. Beneath each of these flaps is a membrane which is finely ridged. branes they are caused to rub against the surface of the flaps, thus causing the shrill noise. The females are not provided with this apparatus. When the insects emerge from the ground the only evidence of wings is a pair of wing-pads-one on each shoulder. But after emerging the insect crawls up on a fence, tree or other object, and soon s expands the body as to split the has a pair of pants that he bought skin open down the back and the before the Civil War, that are in insect deliberately crawls out of the skin a new creature, with a soft, whitish body at first, which hardens and turns darker on exposure to air and light.
