The store of J. P. Boyette and Son was burglarized Tuesday night. The burglar broke a glass in the back window and cut out a piece of screen; this enabled him to reach through the window and unlatch it. The only thing missed by Messrs. Boyette so far is the key to the back door. Evidently their visitor does not care to go to so much trouble when he decides to make another visit. The guilty party is unknown.

SAREPTA'S SUIT

By MARY J. CLARK

© 1922, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

"We've all told our vacation plans but you, Anna," said one of a group of young teachers.

"Yes," chimed in another, "and we are dying to know whom you are making this set for."

"Isn't it lovely!" exclaimed two in a breath, as they held up collar and cuffs and a vest of exquisite embroidery. "You can almost pick off those violets."

"Whoever gets that set will be lucky."

"Well," said Anna. "I'm going out in the country, way back, and I shall take Aunt Sarepta to spend Sunday in Boston, and she is to have this set. You see, girls, it's like this. She never had a chance to go anywhere—always stayed at home and been a good angel to her father and mother."

"She and Uncle Amos were lovers then, and he wanted to be married, but she waited on and on because the old people needed her so much. Then he was shipwrecked and thrown ashore nearer dead than alive, and crippled for life; but she married him just the same."

Anna had been planning the treat for a long time, and last vacation had made a visit to Aunt Sarepta and begged to make over her one best gown, a dove-colored silk.

"Why, child," objected Aunt Sarepta, "it was my wedding gown. I don't go anywhere to wear it. I expect to be laid out in it."

"You're going to have some good times before you are laid out, and in this very gown, too. Let me take your measures."

"There, auntie," she declared, as she gave a final whisk to the tape measure, "there's enough of silk, and I will have everything ready."

Sunday dawned clear and cold. Anna had planned an early start for Boston and it was time to hurry breakfast and begin Aunt Sarepta's adorning.

Behold, then, Aunt Sarepta in her dove-colored silk, complete with the lovely embroidered set—a dainty bonnet nestling in the puffs of her soft gray hair and a pair of beautiful light gloves for a final touch.

Aunt Sarepta and Anna picked their way across lots to the new bridge, where just beyond, they could take the trolley.

"Look out, Auntie. Don't fall—it's dreadfully slippery going down to the bridge."

"I'll be careful. Land o' liberty! You are down yourself. Are you hurt, Anna? Can't you get up?"

"I'm trying. Oh, dear! I can't. I've twisted my foot somehow, and now we can't go to Boston."

"Let me help you, ladies," said a hearty voice, as a stalwart young figure emerged from under the bridge.

"Hugh—Mr. Dorrance—where did you come from?"

"Under the bridge—been doing a bit of inspecting, and I saw you fall. Miss Anna, you can't walk."

"Try," urged Aunt Sarepta, "and I'll stand one side of you and help."

"By your leave," said Hugh, and gathering Anna's slender figure in his arms, he followed in Aunt Sarepta's wake, bearing his burden like a feather.

"Sho, now, what's to pay!" shouted Uncle Amos, clattering to the door on his crutches.

"There, dearie," said Aunt Sarepta, "it's a sprain, and you will have to keep still. I know just what to do, and I have got everything handy."

"I don't mind for myself," faltered poor Anna, "but I can't stand your not going to Boston. I'm not sorry, I'm just mad!" and she lifted her eyes, half fearful, half smiling, to Hugh.

"Now," said the young man, "I have this day to myself. That inspection at the bridge was for my own benefit, and if you will trust me with your aunt, I'll brush up a little and take her to Boston myself. There is plenty of time."

"Would you really?" cried Anna, joyously.

Once more Aunt Sarepta started, and as she and her escort walked along, she told him about her new suit.

The young civil engineer listened, and did a great deal of thinking. He was on his mettle. The old lady should not be the loser by change of escort. They arrived at one of the finest churches just in time, and from one of the best seats Aunt Sarepta feasted her eyes on the garden of lilies in the chancel.

Dear old lady! There was a choice little dinner afterwards, and some slight-sewing, and then home again to the old gambrel roof.

"I feel as if I had been to furrin parts, just like Amos," said Aunt Sarepta, as she bade the young man good-night.

Later, as she stood before the little cracked looking-glass, she whispered softly to herself: "I hain't forgot all about young folks, and I wouldn't wonder if this new suit was all ready for a wedding."

Women in Professions.

There are today two women architects in Paris. Both passed their examination with such distinction that this fact found special mention in the presence of 47 male examiners. In England there are, according to the latest statistics, among others, 312 women physicians, 380 women journalists, 219 women pallbearers, 682 female cab drivers, 74 women chimney sweepers, 438 female smiths, 408 female drummers, and not less than 3,000 professional painters.
