A traveller returning to Randolph county after five or ten years absence sees evidence of that growth as soon as he enters the county. On every hand you find men busy. The time honored citizens distinguished for his grave, decorous demeanor and moving about with a dignity approaching solemnity, saluting his friends with the formality of a Spanish Don, is still here, but his life of ease and luxury has ended and his energies are directed in building up the industries of a great county. Time has passed. Change is stamped on every side. with the same pluck, devotion, honesty, and sturdy courage and with the same principles, the same ideals, the same traits of character that controlled and directed the old civilization, you will find a new order of things in force. The changes which time and circumstances have brought about are marked with new ideas and new life. Our people are more industrious, more energetic, more economical of time, labor and money, more temperate in self indulgence, but in moral traits we are unchanged—brave, courteous, hospitable, truthful; scorning shams and placing not money as the chief end of man. Put under the new order, our people are money-making pushing, sagacious. On every hand the fields show more careful cultivation, the fences improved the houses are being painted and whitewashed, the gates hung straight, more newspapers and books read and intelligence is more generally diffused.

Cedar Falls.

Cedar Falls (Randolph county,) has a great deal to recommend it, and one discovers some new feature that is desirable on each new visit. It is a pleasant thing to be able to note how profuse nature has been here and there in our State in a topographic sense forming rugged, rocky cliff, adorned with spruce and cedar, spreading out green vales and meadows below, and sending down from the rock heights streams of pure crystal water whose silvery music is a perpetual hymn of quiet joy and praise. Just before the center of the village is reached Deep river leaps over continuous and irregular ledges of sharp granite, while on either side down to the water's edge there is a thick growth of small trees, which partly conceal the stream itself, and giving a fall which affords for the factory one of the best water powers that can be found anywhere. Indeed, it seems to leave nothing wanting, the volume of water being abundant and the fall being very heavy, Nature, too, chose to rear all its cliffs and crags on the North side of the river, above and below and opposite the factory site, while on the South side are the beautiful flats for meadows and fields, with the most choice elevations here and there for residences. This gives a beautiful variety, and it is doubtful where one should choose to stand, whether on the North side or the South to obtain the most interesting view. From the South side one gets a fine view of the factory, the store, the residences, the chief of which is that of the beautiful home of Mr. Cox, and the railroad, which comes down by a serpentine curve from among the crags on the west, runs on the rear of the factory and the store and then curves gracefully in front of Mr. Cox's residence in its course down the bank of the river to Franklinsville and Rameur, a few miles below.

But if you stand on the North side you see the river to great advantage, with its substantial covered bridge, while beyond the river you have a picture of meadow, field, orchard and gently sloping hills, with here and there a quiet cottage home, the churches standing off on their own elevations. What a beautiful place anywhere!
