We will take occasion here to supply an omission in the article written some time since. We omitted mention of the peculiar dryness and equilibrium of the atmosphere. This is no doubt due to the thermal subterranean influences which ley. These maintain an evenness of temperature rising high above the surface which forbids the formation of fogs. A fog may form, and probably does form, every morning in the gorge above the entrance of the valley, in the narrows up Spring Creek, and in the narrowing valley down the river. These fogs come in sight and seem to make most desperate, intelligent effort to occupy the val-ley of the Springs. They come down in mass, or they send out skirmish lines; they send out flanking parties, they thrust their fulers in altenuated streamers, but suddenly they melt away; and the sunlight in the valley is never obscur-ed by a morning fog, and none others are known in the mountains as a common atmospheric feature.
