THE EFFECT OF FRIGHT.

Thompson cites the case of a workman at York, who, having fallen from a high building that he was repairing, succeeded in holding on to the gutter with one hand. He was rescued, but not until his hair had turned white.

While the hair of people verging toward middle age turns gray slowly and progressively, the whitening of a single hair usually occurs in one night. This gives some ground for belief when stories are told of people whose hair has become white in one night through fright.

A Dutch physician, Junius, tells of a nobleman of high rank who, being condemned to be beheaded, grew gray in one night. The same thing happened to Seigneur de St. Vallier, father of Diana of Poitiers, while Guarin, professor of Greek at Verona, grew gray all at once on learning of the loss at sea of a chest of manuscripts that was coming from Constantinople.

Bichat saw one of his friends grow quite white in the space of a single night, after having experienced a violent emotion. The unfortunate queen, Marie Antoinette, grew almost entirely gray during the night preceding her execution. Moleschott relates that Louise Sforza grew entirely white in the night following his defeat and capture, after his campaign against Louis XII.
