stand by Charles A. Webb. Mr. Webb said he recalled one occasion when he met Mr. Pulliam in the fall of 1893, and that Mr. Pulliam impressed him as a very sick man. After Pulliam left the city, Mr. Webb said, that he talked with his brother Alex, frequently about the disappearance and that in the course of one conversation Alex had told him that the defendant was crazy and the family had no idea where he was, although many telegrams had been sent to places where it was thought he might be. Later Mr. Webb proffered his services to Mrs. Pulliam, who said she at that time realized that she should not have allowed Mr. Pulliam to leave the city alone, and that she would never forgive herself for having done so.

Miss Susan Yeatman testified that she had known the defendant for ten years and that in 1893 Mr. Pulliam's manner indicated that he was morose and depressed. She had also gathered that this was a fact from the attitude of the family towards the defendant. One morning she had met Mr. Pulliam and he had remarked that he was drunk, not from drinking whiskey, but from using morphine. Mr. Pulliam had added the request for her not to tell her brother as he might arrest him. This notwithstanding the fact that her brother was not any way connected with the police force.

W. R. Bearden gave evidence to the effect that Mr. Pulliam's family lived in his house in the fall of 1893. He knew Mr. Pulliam intimately. "I have placed my hands on Mr. Pulliam," said Mr. Bearden, "and he would be cold, yet perspiration would fall from his finger tips and face. The veins on his forehead would stand out like whip cords, and I have helped to administer narcotics to him while he was suffering one of his spells. The last week before he left Mr. Pulliam was beside himself with pain. There were times when he did not seem to grasp the meaning of simple questions. He was under the influence of narcotics practically all the time and I know he was not responsible for half of his acts. On the 30th, the day he left, I do not believe he was able to determine between right and wrong."

Mr. Bearden was given wide latitude and was allowed to tell his story and indulge in numerous expressions of opinion without interruption from the district attorney. On cross-examination Mr. Holton pressed the witness to name some specific act which justified the conclusion that Mr. Pulliam was irresponsible, especially when he had the ability to go to the bank before leaving and straighten out the bank books. Mr. Bearden could not recall any special instance that led to his conclusions as to the defendant's irresponsibility but inferred as much from his general demeanor. The cross-examination of this witness took a somewhat humorous turn. The district attorney fired away like this: "So you may be crazy yourself, Mr. Bearden?" Mr. Bearden: "Why, yes; I might be."

The district attorney: "Well, if you are crazy, stand aside."

E. L. Brown testified that Mr. Pulliam had once told him that he believed he was going crazy.

Mrs. Ella S. McLoud, sister of the defendant, said that she had observed the very greatest change in her brother, in his manner and conduct. "This was noticeable more and more as time passed and he would avoid members of the family. He looked haggard and careworn, and he seemed to be suffering constantly."

LARGE SPACE ADVERTISING
Every one who has met with success of a mercantile nature, will readily acknowledge the importance of judicious advertising. But now and then we hear it said, by those who for the most part are unsuccessful in their business undertakings, that advertising is a useless expenditure. Persons who express themselves thus, have never given the subject the attention it demands; for, to make advertising pay, it must be gone about in a way characterized by all the earnestness, careful forethought and persistence that the most important feature of the business would demand.

I presume that none will deny that the best place to carry an advertisement is in the daily papers. Whether a large or small space is selected, let it be remembered that the selection should be with a view to a specific purpose. If the person believes that a small space will serve that purpose, then let him remember further that to reap adequate returns his advertisement must be kept alive by frequent changes, and must not be carried for a few days or weeks, but for months.

Those who are acquainted with the same appended to this article, will remember to have seen small space announcements in the Gazette with frequent changes during the past six months.

The writer did not expect immediate and very lucrative returns from these small-space announcements but had expected enough returns to justify the expense with an added profit, and in this he has not been disappointed. But these small-space announcements were carried with a view of preparing the way for a larger space, and recently a larger space was contracted for. Here is where the whole scheme was to culminate and the profits to be realized. It was not doubted from the beginning that this would bring ample returns, and it did.
