A Curious Situation

HE report that the democratic national committee finds itself embarrassed for speakers is probably founded in the reluctance of prominent democrats to put inemselves on record at a time when the party is feeling about for popular issues. The lack of issues indeed is so apparent and real that the more sagacious leaders in the democratic party are said to question the desirability of a struggle to gain control of the next house of representatives. Of course, this may be due largely to a conviction formed after a survey of the field that there is no chance of getting the majority in the coming congress, but were a majority possible. the conviction that the exhibition of futility, if not of destructiveness, that it would make would injure the chances of democratic success in the presidential campaign, is a reasonable convic-

While hesitation to commit themselves in public speech is general among the more prudent democratic politicians, there is no such reluctance on the part of republicans. The policies with which the party enters the campaign are boldly announced, and differences of opinion receive that open ; discussion which tends to public enlightenment and final settlement. The president, himself, leads the way in thus taking the people into consideration in the discussion of the affairs of the nation. This has the effect of fairly placing public questions in the arena where they must ultimately be settled. Looking at the speeches made by President Roosevelt in the New England states and in the south, the Harper's Weekly sees in them the thought and the language of a man who is fronting the future. Whatever else may be said of his public utterances, they show him a man whose purpose is to deal with the problems of today and tomorrow, instead of those that have come up in the past and have been disposed of, and, moreover, they rouse the hearers to active participation in this attitude of fronting the future. In summing up the New England speeches, the New Haven Evening Register

"It will be noticed that while Mr. Roosevelt shows a remarkable appreciation of human nature, he sticks very closely to his universal text, which is always that of good and active citizenship. He has put it, during his New England trip, in a hundred different ways, but in sense and essence it always gets back to the simple assertion that it is no use being good unless that admirable quality shows itself in good deeds. He does not believe a man should be content to wear his citizenship, he should use it, consctantly and persistently, to raise the standard of government and the tone of society. The impression which the president is making on the country is an agreeable one, and bears very little relation to politics. His New Enginterest to the western trip which he will soon take."

While the republican president is endeavoring to promote good citizenship and the active and intelligent interest in public affairs that results in good government, while there is an open and free discussion by republican speakers of problems of the present and future, there is, on the other hand, a general reluctance on the part of democrats to touch upon such problems, and such spellbinders as are not lying low are carefully avoiding questions of the present or future, if not harping persistently on those of the past. It seems to be the best they can do; open discussion of any live subject bearing on national policy might be the death blow, according to their shortsighted view, of the precarious party organization. Besides, it is difficult to find a live subject that is not getting open discussion by republican speakers. On the whole, the situation is a curious one, and it even looks as if the democrats were not only without policies, but that they might come to the point upon what to oppose.

The strike will benefit neither the strikers nor the coal operators, nor will it seriously affect the ordinary citizen, if these views of the matter are correct. The strikers lose wages, the coal operator sells less coal and the citizen shuts up part of his house for the winter. Just where the good comes in to anybody is not apparent, unless it demonstrates to the consumer, who is supposed to pay the bills for disturbances of this sort, that there are more ways to kill a cat than to choke it with cream.
