LOST—Folding black pocketbook containing $66,00, on Swannanca avepuge or petwers swan princes and princesses in Italy don't necessarily belong to the royal family. Italy formerly was broken up into small tracts or principalities. They are now united in a kingdom, but their princely families retain their titles.

Before reaching home the Princess Bobbeloni became very gracious to Si-gnor Tomkins, as she called him, and invited him to visit her in her villa on the outskirts of Rome. But he was not to call for a week, since the place had been closed and needed to be opened. She took his address and promised to send him hers later. From something she said Tom gathered that she desired time to ask the American minister something about him.

The week passed, and Tom waited mpatiently at his botel without receiving any word from the princess. But a couple of days later a liveried servant called and presented a little note with a crest on it containing an invitation for 5 o'clock English tea at her villa. Tom presented himself at the hour named and found the lady in a sump-

"Ah, Signor Tomkins," she said in charming broken English, "I am glad to see you. I confess that having met you as a stranger I thought it prudent to make inquiries about you. And I am happy to announce that they have resulted satisfactorily. If there were titles in your country you would be at least a baron." "Thank you very much," said Tom in bad Italian. "How quickly you are picking up our language," replied the princess. "You will soon speak it like a native." Tom drank ten with the princess spending a delightful hour with her then she dismissed him, saying: "I will be happy to have you meet some of my friends. Let me see—this evening there is a court ball; tomorrow

I dine with the Duchess of Chevrini Thursday I am free. Have you any engagement for that evening?" Tom said he had, but he would break it for the inestimable privilege o meeting the princess' friends. evening was free, but with true Ameri

On the proposed evening Signor Tomkins presented himself at the princess' villa and was introduced to several princes, an English duchees who was found useful as an interpreter, and other magnates. They were all very civil to Tom, considering that he was a titleless American, and he was delighted at mingling for the first time in his life with a real aristocracy. time in his life with a real aristocracy Card tables were set, and the princess proposed bridge whist. Tom was honored by being placed at the hostess table and especially so by having her for a partner. One of the gentlemen proposed to make the points 5 france, but the princess would not consent to more than a franc. Tom did not wonder that she objected to a sizable stake, for she proved a very poor player. She and Tom began to lose with the first game and lost steadily. Then the princess figured that she had lost 2,500 francs, or $500. This seemed to trouble her, and she proposed to make the points stand for 10 francs each in order to recoup. Tom was a loser equally with her, but did not object. Meanwhile refreshments were served, including wine. As the princess lost she kept pro-posing to double the stakes, and at midnight Tom found himself playing
