A CUCUMBER CRAZE

By M. QUAD

Copyright, 1911, by Associated Literary Press.

It was said that the farmers in the country about Olney were up to snuff. No patent hayforks could be unloaded on them. Of the hundreds of patent medicine circulators they received each year not one resulted in the sale of a consumption cure. The tin peddlers who dealt with them took their lives in their hands. "Cute" was the word applied to the people of the town and county.

One October day a middle aged man of good address might have been seen driving toward Olney in a buggy. It was raining, and the highway was muddy. At a certain spot a wheel fell into a rut, and the buggy was tipped over. Five minutes later a citizen of Olney named Scott came driving in from a crossroad. He at once offered his aid. It wasn't much of a trick to right the buggy, as no damage had been done, but the stranger, who gave his name as Anderson, was profuse in his thanks. He was so profuse as to embarrass Mr. Scott. He said it was the first thing that had happened in years to make him believe in humanity. Mr. Scott could have passed him by, but hadn't done so. Mr. Scott had halted and got down in the pouring rain and grabbed and heaved on the muddy wheel. Mr. Scott had been offered a dollar for his trouble, but had waved it away.

The stranger was to stop at the Raven Inn, in town. He might be there a week. If Mr. Scott would call he would be shown that gratitude still existed in the human breast. Mr. Scott felt that the stranger was overdoing things, but curiosity forced him to call. He was warmly received.

Then Mr. Anderson told his secret. He was traveling over the country to find some farmer he could trust. Those seeds were a new variety of cucumber—a chocolate colored cucumber. It grew to a length of three feet and was going to produce a revolution in food. It could be baked, boiled or fried, the same as a potato, but contained three times the nutriment, and the taste was something that best fried oysters all to smash. The big hotels of the cities would pay a dollar apiece for them and would contract for a million a year. Hush! On your life don't mention it! More money in it than in a diamond mine. Mr. Scott had helped Mr. Anderson out of the mud. Mr. Anderson would now help Mr. Scott out of any financial hole he had fallen into. He would give him twenty of the seeds. The twenty would grow 250 one dollar cucumbers, and the 250 cucumbers would produce a full peck of seeds.

Mr. Scott was amazed, astonished and grateful. It was the first time he had ever been handed something for nothing since coming down with measles.

Mr. Scott did not drop a word to a human soul. His wife saw that he had something on his mind and tried to pick it out of him, but sooner than tell her he let her threaten to go home to her mother. It was Mr. Anderson who tackled a farmer now and then in the streets of Olney and took him to his room and showed him one of the wonderful cucumbers. He didn't do it to sell seeds, just to drop a hint of what was coming.

And then the farmer would go home and think it over. He couldn't wait three years for seeds. He wanted to be in at the start, before the price should drop on an overstocked market. He would go back to the kind Mr. Anderson and ask as a great favor to sell him a score or so. In such and every case he did go back and paid a dollar apiece for the seeds and took his solemn oath not to say a word before the next spring, and he went away with the little packet of seeds hugged to his palpitating heart.

In time that salt bag of seeds was emptied and filled again. In time every man who could raise a few dollars and wanted to make ten for one had bought seeds. The news somehow reached as far as twenty miles away. There was no day that Mr. Anderson didn't have callers and didn't exchange seeds for greenbacks. It was with chocolate colored seeds that he paid his bill at the hotel. The landlord of the Inn was a man who wanted the very best for his guests. If the new brand cucumbers were the best he wanted them.

From October to March Mr. Anderson had a good time. He lived high, had the best room in the house and carried around a pocketful of money. Then one day he had to leave for Buffalo on business. He was to return in two days, but he has not come back as yet. He will never come back in the flesh. His spirit may float over Olney now and then, but no human eye will detect it. When he had been absent for three weeks some of the seeds were sent to the state agricultural college for examination. The report was very brief. It simply said:

"These are the usual cucumber seeds, dyed this color to disguise them."

And were there moanings and lamentation and threats of murder in and about Olney? No, sir. You couldn't find a man who had bought a seed and been swindled. Mr. Anderson had tried to swindle Smith, Jones and Brown, but Smith, Jones and Brown had seen through him in a second. Not one man of the hundreds taken in but what denied it point blank and is denying it to this day. All had reputations to maintain, and they lied boldly and profusely and gamely to maintain it.

Don't trifle with a cold is good advice for prudent men and women. It may be vital in case of a child. There is nothing better than Chamberlain's Cough Remedy for coughs and colds in children. It is safe and sure. For sale by all dealers.
