HAD EYES, BUT SAW NOT.

Then She Realized What it Really Meant to Be Blind.

"Were you ever blind for an epilre evening of your iffe-blind in the misst of a joily company who were sewing and chatting and chatting. and chatting and didn't in the least realize your plirbt?" asked a social worker recently." That was what experience. I sympathize with per-sons who have lost their sight now as Pever did before.

"You see, I went to being educated in a private institution for the blind near here. I had been to see her before, and so I was prepared for the way her companions crowded about me, felt my clothes, my hands about me, feet my clothes, my hands and my face and remarked everything I had on, saying. How becoming her hat is—how pretty she looks! and so on. Nor was I surprised when my friend conducted me through the classrooms, pointing out the new work and displaying some fine tace work she had started that morning, quite as though she could see it all.

"But on this visit, for the first time I was invited to stay for supper and spend the evening with the girls. I was delighted to accept the invitation and enjoyed the meat, which was serv ed by sighted waitresses in a well lighted dinlog room. But after that my experience came. We walked from the dining room into dim haffs, and as we mounted the stairs to the sitting m we walked into utter datkness. room we walked into utter darkness. I began to envy my triend, who tripped lightly by my side, while I could only grope my way awkwardly. Once in the sitting room I felt for a chair and dropped into it, waiting for the lights to be turned on. But the laughter and the charter went on unconcernedly about me, and after a few minutes it dawned upon me that lights were not necessary in an institution minutes it dawned upon me that lights were not necessary in an institution for the hind at night; that the sitting room was no darker for those girls then than it had been all through the beautiful, sunny day I had enjoyed to guch. As my eyes grow a bit accustomed to the darkness I could perceive that the girls had drawn their chairs up around mine and were busy with embroidery and lace making as they talked.

"And for the rest of the meaning in they talked.

"And for the rest of the evening is ant there trying not to let my blindness fret me, not to appear stupid when the girls, forgotful of my affliction, baid up their work for my inspection. That was the time I realized what it really is to be blind."—New York Press.

claim to rank among civilized nations."
On reading the foregoing in the Java
Times we are reminded of Professor Kenny's story of the shipwrecked mariner who at dawn came across a gibbet and exclaimed, "Thank God, here is a sign of civilization!"—London

A Clever Phrase.

In a small volume of humorous letters and poems, one of these the classic "City of Prague," by the late William Jeffrey Prowse, there occurs the in the contest. Fun, referring to Prowse's apprentice connection with the Aylesbury News: "I find among his papers a rough copy dated 1855, which wind up with this complet:

"His courtiers found him out at last be-neath the table sunk, Problematically plous, but indubitably drunk.

"It is not every lad of twenty who can pen as neat and smart a line as that last."—London Chropicle.

Pape's initials. Alexander Pope was a victim of his initials. After the publication of the Dunciad one of the poet's enemies, who had suffered a severe trouncing in the satire, declared that if you took the initial letters of Pope's name and added the final letter of his surname you had his character. The "jest" caught on, and in 1728 appeared a pamphlet entitled "Pope Alexander's Supremacy and Infallibility Examined." The frontispiece to this now forgotten pasquinade represented Pope in the form of an ape, with his head resting on his hand, and his elbow placed upon a pile of his own works.

man said, "Doctor, I'm as bungry as a bear, but from what you tell me I mustn't eat, anything."

"Quite correct." replied the physician, who is inclined to be somewhat absentinged, "and be sure, above everything else, to chew it thoroughly."
