NIGHT PUBLICITY

Night publicity is the utilization of and "the better the light, the more business."

It depends for its success upon the natural law that causes things and people to turn toward the light. It depends also upon the production of incandescent lamps, without which could be had very little effective outdoor illumination

With a few incandescent lamps and a little current we can now cause the front of a store to blossom with light; brilliant, attractive and compelling. We can force attention by utilizing sharp contrast between light and darkness; a thing possible only at night. We can take a dark street, provided it is fairly accessible, and make it a popular and populous night thoroughfare; and it is neither difficult not very expensive. We need only string it with electric signs, outline ome of the store windows with incandescent lamps, equip a few of the signs with flashes-in short, light it up. People will then come there by en windows repaned, tight doors the thousands, where formerly they shunned the street because it was

Help the kidneys with their work. The Auditorium was well filled last night by the lovers of good music comedy who had gone out to see the production of "Jumping Jupiter" as Carle and Edna Wallace Hopper as the stars in the cast. It was a most pleasing production, too, and will be remembered by those who saw it as one of the big comedy attractions that have been seen here this year. The whole show is rich in comedy of the rarest kind and is not of the variety that is motheaten with age. It is decidedly refreshing and with the very select musical numbers that it furnished one of the best entertain ment productions yet seen at the Auditorium. The Auditorium was well filled las
