

Wanted—Five Acres of Sod

MAY 1ST. NEXT.

In finishing and landscaping Grove Park Inn grounds we will need sod enough to cover about five acres, and are advertising for it this far in advance so that any one with sod to sell, or caring to make a contract with us, will have time to prepare it and have a good stand of grass before the time we will need it. Please communicate with us by letter, giving your price delivered or undelivered.

Three Old Maids And a Widow

And the Prize They Set Out to Capture.

By C. E. LEWIS.

There are few towns of 1,500 population that can boast of three old maids and a widow living on the same street, but that was the case with Clifton. Miss Vinton was an old maid because she never had met with a man good enough for her. Miss Hopkins was an old maid because the young man she would have married at eighteen was sawed in two in a sawmill and she vowed to be true to his memory. Miss Warner was an old maid because she was determined to marry none but a minister, and all the ministers who came were already provided for. The Widow Carter was a widow because part of a house had fallen on her husband.

The old maids and the widow were on visiting terms—in fact they rather liked each other. Where there are no male candidates for matrimony concerned old maids and widows can sit down together on the same veranda without quarreling. After the widow had solemnly assured the old maid that nothing on the face of this earth could induce her to be false to the memory of her crushed the quartet loved each other even more.

One day one of the merchants in the town sold out, and a stranger came to take his place. If he had been a married man the dove of peace would have continued to hover over Rose street, but as he was single, only thirty and a "scat" the dove saw a hot time ahead.

The widow let no grass grow under her feet in calling at the stores and in evidently mentioning her usage and ordering four pounds of sugar all at once. She was one of the Four Hundred of the town, and on the part of the other 399 she said Mr. Strong would come to their aid. When he had thanked her she ordered two nutmegs and a paper of starch, in addition to the sugar, to let him understand that she wasn't obliged to pinch pennies and then departed.

An hour later her reprehensible conduct was known to the three old maids and up went three pairs of hands; six eyes were turned upward in horror and three mouths opened to exclaim in chorus, "How shocking!"

Then, during the next two days, each of the old maids made an excuse to call at the store and follow the program carried out by the widow. Each thought she was sly and slick, but they found each other out, and from that moment the bond of friendship snared us under like an old clothesline left out in the storm of a year.

When women take war on each other they don't use fence rails to pound each other on the head. In most cases they go right on treating each other as nicely as they can to their faces, but using daggers and the darkness to assassinate. The three old maids and the widow gathered together as of yore, but the dagger was used whenever there was the least show.

Mr. Strong proved a social success. The widow gave a little dinner and brought him out, but the old maids really monopolized him for the evening. Then Miss Warner gave an exhibition of her own paintings, which consisted of a cow apparently thirty-six feet long and of a river running upstream instead of down, and the widow held Mr. Strong's attention for an hour while she talked about her cattle and departed.

At the end of six weeks the man who ran the sawmill and had a mortgage on the mill dam figured it out to his wife:

"There are three old maids to one widow, but if the widow gets left she'll be the first one I ever heard of."

Even the small boys around town noticed how gaily the old maids were becoming. They giggled; they uttered cute little screams when they turned a corner and found themselves face to face with a cow; they tittered when they asked for gumdrops at the grocery. As for the widow, she set her jaw and walked into the store two or three times a week to ask the merchant if he thought the Seventy-seventh National bank of Boston was perfectly sound and to sigh with relief when he assured her of his confidence in the institution. Sly reports were soon afloat that Mr. Strong was paying his attentions to this or that one of the four. Then the other three would reply as one:

"Well, may be he is, but what on earth he can see in her is more than I can make out. She grows more homely and dowdified every day. Of course I'm telling you this in confidence, and, of course, it won't go further."

One fatal evening tragedy after tragedy happened, and the light went out of several happy households. Mr. Strong boarded with a family living half a mile from the store. He hated the walk. He had to cross the bridge over the river and ascend a hill covered with woods, and there wasn't a house between his boarding place and the town.

The three old maids and the widow had had their eyes on this road from the first. They had soon begun walking for exercise. They didn't walk all the hours the merchant might be expected, and if they encountered each other they made all manner of exchanges, but each one understood what the other was at and determined to baffle her in the end.

Mr. Strong had been given three months in which to declare his intentions, and he hadn't declared. Time was too valuable to be wasted. His habit was to return to his store after a 6 o'clock supper and remain there until 8. Just before 8 o'clock, then, on this awful night four human figures might have been seen stealing out of the town and over the bridge.

Each and every one of them would have paused on the bridge to listen to the musical plash of the river if they hadn't seen each other. The first, second and third were obliged to get on to avoid the last one. She was the widow. She knew the value of a bridge and a river and a musical plash, and she determined to stick.

One old tramp and a dog were responsible for most of what followed. The tramp came lurching along through the town, bent on finding a country inn—such as was possible, and as the widow on the bridge heard his footsteps she began to feel nervous and gay.

It was labor thrown away. The tramp was neared and bumped up against her, and in her fright she went over the low railing and down into the water. If she couldn't swim like a duck she could at least scramble like a cat, and she managed to get ashore. Her condition was dripping also drooping, also indignant. She realized that no dripping drooping woman stood the slightest show in that respect, and she dragged herself homeward and was not improved in looks or temper by having to wade through a couple of mud puddles.

Mrs. Vinton came next. She was sauntering up the hill wondering how "that widow" dared to be bold and tempestrous when the tramp, who was now on the run for his life, overtook her. In his nearedness he took her for a house and wagon and tried to shake out. She shied to the right at the same time and was sent sprawling by the collision. She got out of the roadside ditch to run into a patch of briars and scream for help, but there was no help. She had to extricate herself and follow the bedraggled widow.

The dog alone was responsible for what happened to the other two old maids. Miss Warner had discovered one woman ahead and two behind her, and, suspecting their nefarious intentions, she had almost made up her mind to abandon her object when the dog, who had been calling on his brother out in the country, came along and set up a barking and growling. Tragedy was the result. The old maid never had encountered such an obstinate dog at night on a hill, and she at once scrambled over the fence into the weeds and ran for her life. She fell and rolled over, and she rose up again and struggled on, and when she reached home two hours later she immediately went into hysterics, and Dr. Seuss got his first night call for fourteen years.

The dog had met with such success that he was encouraged to persevere. He came upon Miss Hopkins out of the shadows like a lurking haystack, and as she screamed out and spread her wings to fly she tripped and went down. The field might have injured her but for the fact that she fell upon soft mud. She couldn't go back to town looking like the humor master for a skyscraper, and she continued on to the merchant's boarding house to get the use of hoes and scrapers. They were furnished, but while she was using them she heard the ten-year-old daughter whispering to her mother that she'd let a cent that Miss Hopkins had come out there to giggle for Mr. Strong.

That was an awful night in Clifton, though only four remaining hearts knew just how awful it was. Morning dawned with murky sky overhead. It seemed to three old maids and a widow as if something more was still to happen. They were right. When the butcher boy called for his orders he repeated the same words at every house on his route:

"Say, you heard the news? Mr. Strong has gone to Phillipsville to get married today, and he's goin' to bring the bride home tonight. Hain't it great?"

Turkish Landscapes.

Sir Charles Eliot gives a dreamy impression of the regions on which the world's eyes are now fixed. "Whether one goes through Adriatic to Saloniki, the sides of the railways look desolate and lifeless. Hills overgrown with dwarf oak alternate with plains whose bareness is half covered with scrubby grass. There are few signs of cultivation and fewer of human habitation. Oriental railways have a way of only skirting the edge of cities, and stations are sometimes several miles from the places whose names they bear. The deserted appearance of the land is intensified by the Turkish habit of constructing towns in depressions of the undulating plains, where they are invisible at a short distance."—Chicago News.

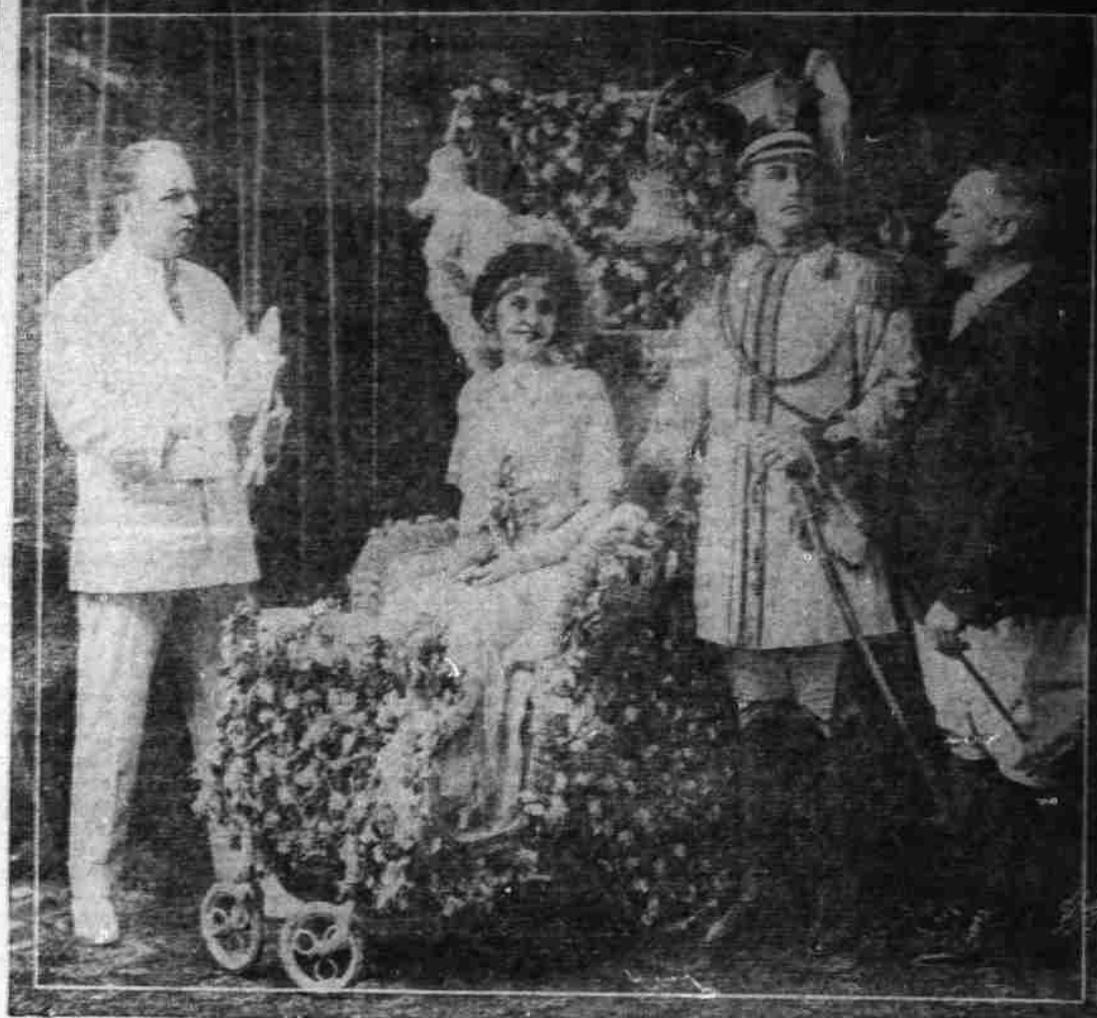

An Old New York Landmark.

Another New York landmark is passing—the Mott Memorial Surgical and Medical Library property. It will be altered for business purposes. The library was established in 1866 by Dr. Valentine Mott, father of American surgery, as he was later called. At that period he was one of the foremost surgeons. There were no medical libraries in New York then, and to help along students Dr. Mott gave his private library, which was one of the best in the country. Besides his books, medical instruments of the different periods were on exhibition there. The books and the instruments of Dr. Mott have now been taken by the New York Academy of Medicine.

WERBA & LUENSCHER Present

The operetta that enjoyed a two season's run at the Globe theater, New York city through its captivating music, delicious comedy, witty settings and gorgeous gowns and was pronounced by all who witnessed this opera of fun and fashion as prettier than its sister opera "The Spring Maid."

"Miss Evelyn Stewart as Daphne, the daughter of the duke's housekeeper, who stood by the duke after his rich uncle was supposed to have had a male heir and the duke thereby deprived of all prospects possessed beauty, grace and a sweet soprano voice. Her role was perhaps not surprisingly difficult, yet she succeeded with a thoroughness that was entirely pleasing. Arthur Birley, as the duke who was living very considerably beyond an income of nothing at all, was fully equal to the demands on him. His voice, though not strong, was clearly lyrical and true."

"The dancing was splendidly done in every number of an excellent variety of fantasias, and a chorus of diminutive ballet girls of perhaps six winters each, four little misses, was the hit of the piece. Unannounced on the program, their appearance just
