WONDERFUL GROWTH OF GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY

Started in 1888 With 167 Members—Membership Is Now 281,556.

Washington, D. C., May 13.—Every town and hamlet in the United States with a population exceeding 100 inhabitants contains one or more members of the National Geographic Society, according to a report just made to the society at its headquarters here, by Gilbert H. Grosvenor, director and editor.

In 1888, the National Geographic Society was organized under a national charter "to promote the increase and diffusion of geographic knowledge." Its only income was the dues of its members, 167 in number. It had no permanent home, its headquarters occupying half of a small office room.

When this policy was adopted, the society had less than 200 members outside the city of Washington. One year later its out-of-town membership had increased five fold. As the society's income increased, the money was reinvested in its magazine.

The society's work of increasing geographic knowledge, by encouraging exploration and research work with which financial grants as its resources will permit, has taken it into many fields. It has just embarked on another expedition to the wilds of Peru.

A series of investigations, extending over three years, of the glaciers of Alaska has been completed. The society investigated the recent eruption of Mt. Katmai, in Alaska. It sent an expedition to Mount Pelee and La Soufriere to study the eruptions of these volcanoes, and a trained geologist to Sicily to investigate the Messina earthquake.
