SEEKS INFORMATION AS TO N. C. I ROHIBITION

Special to The Gazette-News. Raleigh, July 29.—A special agent sent into North Carolina by Virginia interests to gather information as to the operation of prohibition in this state spent yesterday in Raleirh and called on the state officers for interviews with the result that the concensus of their opinions was that state has been benefited by prohibition. The agent said that he had found many localities in this state where labor was still much demoralized by the liquor traffic. He says he is gathering views on both sides of the prohibition question and the weight of evidence will be ascertained as for or against best results of pro hibition in this state. He has not suf-ficiently canvassed the state as yet to form an idea as to the outcome of his poll of the leading men of the state. Material he gathers is to be seed in the Virginia campaign.

THE YAQUIS' REVENGE

By M. QUAD Copyright, 1914, by Associated Lit-erary Press.

Every American of us at the silver mines had turned out with the Mexican soldiery to help drive the Yaquis back to their hiding place in the mountains. It was a case of self preservation with us. When the Yaqui was on a raid he made no difference between the property or scalp of an American and a Mexican. He owned the land before Cortez appeared. The process of weeding him out is still going on.

And so when the news came in that the Yaquis had taken the warpath and killed or driven off the men at the Soltalto mine above us we turned out with the 300 soldiers sent up to meet the war party and drive it back.

For three days we fought the Yaquis before we got them on the retreat. It was not enough, however, that we had saved the big mines and 500 almost defenseless people. Orders came to the colonel to push on after the retreating Indians and hold them up if possible and exterminate them. We went with them to see the thing through and because they had need of our rifles and of our sharpshooting. Once among the mountains the soldiers could no longer move in a body. There was constant fighting, but the Indians were continually forced back. By and by they had reached the women and children and their stronghold, and the Mexican colonel rubbed his hands and laughed and said:

"We have got them penned up at last, and not one shall escape. It is the best show we have had for half a century to exterminate them."

The stronghold of the Indians was a series of rifts and caves in the face of the mountain. There was but one path leading to it. That wound over a number of ridges and then dipped down into a basin which had a circumference of about half a mile. The colo nel's plan was to advance the whole force into this basin when night fell and, taking cover behind the bowlders lying thickly beneath the caves, we should be ready at daylight to begin the work of extermination. While a portion of the troopers kept up a fire to prevent the Yaquis from leaving their caves another portion would collect fuel and smoke them to death. We were not averse to dealing the Indians a hard blow and one to be remembered, but we did not go in for the extermination of a thousand souls at once, more than half of whom were women and children. "Gentleman, you are not under my command," said the colonel as he rubbed his hands and smiled, "and you will therefore decide for yourselves. When darkness comes my command will march down into the basin. For fifteen years I have been hunting the Yaquis. For fifteen years I have been hoping for just this chance."

They could not charge us with cow ardice, but when our decision not to support them in a massacre was made known there were smiles and expressions of contempt.

An hour after dark the soldiers left us and went marching in single file AGENTS WANTED-To advertise er not be quoted." - Cleveland Plain down into the basin. I do not believe the first man had yet descended into the basin when we suddenly caug sight of a signal fire to the right. The Yaquis were not to be surprised. During the next hour the whole side of who, to locate the place on the lake the mountain showed signals at intervals, and then there was an interval of three hours, during which not a light center of the mountain a signal fire avenue. Reasonable terms, more than a minute and was followed by a noise none of us could make Phone 974 10 North Pack Square out. It was like the roaring of a gale in a narrow gorge of the mountains, and we had been listening to it for perbaps ten minutes when from the dark basin beneath us arose such a cry as few men ever heard. "In the name of God, what can it be?" asked each man of his comrade. er the scream died away, but more fall terms of the county schools. softly than at first. From that hour till dawn came there was no signaling. no noise, nothing to prove that there was life in the mountains beyond our little band. The peaks of the mountains stood out first. Then we followed the dawn down till our eyes rested on the caves. In front of them were bundreds of people, but they were standing quiet and peering down into the basin. In another minute daylight had crept down there, and we looked and cried aloud in horror. The bottom of the basin, as we saw it the evening ing before, had been covered with scrubs and grass. It was a basin still, but the bottom was hidden under ten, twenty, thirty feet of water. There was no outlet, and we could see the waters rushing and swirling round and round as if to find one. And borne on the rush were the bodies of the dead-of the 231 men who had left us a few hours before. Not one had escaped. High up on their side of the mountain the Yaquis had dammed a spring or rivulet and stored up the waters for just such an emergency. At midnight they had let the flood loose and it had come tearing down at lightning speed to overwhelm the enemy caught like rate in a trap. As we turn ed away in our borror to make our way down the mountains the Yaquis raised their voices in one long shout of exultation and then were stient They had reaped their vengeance and were satisfied to let us depart in peace
