BRYAN'S SECRETARYSHIP IN RETROSPECT

The press supporting President Wilson in this international crisis is faying Mr. Bryan for deserting the ship of state in time of peril, seeing in his retirement an inconsistency in that he had signed the first Lusitania note to Germany, but refused to sign another of like tenor.

The Gazette-News has taken the position that Mr. Bryan's retirement was forced by circumstances over which he apparently had no control.

The retirement of Mr. Bryan from his post had to be. The student of modern history will have a realizing sense of this. Speculation at this moment upon what the act portends will be largely profane.

Mr. Bryan was not alone in the belief that the course being pursued by the Administration freely admit that the policy may so eventuate.

Mr. Bryan was not alone in the belief that the course being pursued by the Administration freely admit that the policy may so eventuate.

Mr. Bryan did a great deal for Mr. Wilson in the salvage line at Baltimore. Millions of people no doubt subscribed to the view that it was the former secretary of state who put Mr. Wilson in the White House.

Moreover, there is this consideration: even those who have been severe in their criticism of him at times have been ready to admit of late months that Mr. Bryan, to outward appearance, has been interested primarily in making the Democratic Administration a success, and of course Mr.

Bryan understood that a successful Administration meant another term for the President, without reference to his interpretation of the one term plank in the Baltimore platform.

No doubt Mr. Bryan found his position personally distasteful. His position had come to be purely clerical in character. Men of outstanding intellect and force have held the premiership in the American cabinet, and heretofore it has been the custom to hold them largely, if not chiefly, responsible for the successful administration of our foreign affairs.

Mr. Bryan was asked to sign state papers whose contents could not be harmonized with his ideas of international morality. This, of course, was quite enough to render imperative his removal from Mr. Wilson's council chamber.

It may be that no harm will befall the Democratic party, as a political organization, as a result of the defection, as at this "time of stress" of the man who has for years done so much to fashion Democratic destinies.

Mr. Bryan was not alone in the belief that the course being pursued by the Administration freely admit that the policy may so eventuate.

Bed Time Tales By Clara Ingram Judson.

Tommy Tittle-Mouse Has a Visitor.

Tommy Tittle-Mouse and his little mate were so busy getting settled that they had no time to look around and get acquainted with their new home.

time, and they don't move—they're dead things." "Then this isn't a shell," whispered back Mrs. Tommy fearfully.

The little creature in the shell laughed softly.

"I believe we had better gnaw that out into a passage way for use when danger threatens from in front," said Tommy to his mate.

"That's well enough to plan for," she replied wisely, "but we must first finish this front part."

"Now how in the world!" exclaimed Tommy Tittle-Mouse, "did that get there?"

"Mrs. Tommy didn't answer; she had run back deep into the new home for safety. 'Tommy! Come here!' she called softly.

"An awful shiver of fear ran down Tommy's spine; as fast as he could scamper, he ran back into the cave where Mrs. Tommy lay shaking and trembling.

"I've seen them in the house many a time, and they don't move—they're dead things."

Day By Day In New York (By O. O. McIntyre).

Special Correspondent of The Gazette-News: New York, June 11.—Mary Austin, the novelist, has made a tour of the cabarets and cafes on Broadway.

When the house was closed this season an army of wreckers began to demolish the interior.

Down on lower Broadway a bright looking young man introduced a new method of attempting to get a job.

The telephone girl in a Broadway hotel was in a flutter of excitement when Jimmy Allison, the correspondent, stepped in to call up a friend.

"I am 25 years old. I have a college education and am a married man of family. I want work. I held my last job for ten years and got an increase in salary each year.

The exodus to the resort hotels has given New York a vacant look. Broadway presents a changed appearance in summer.

"What happened?" "Why the fat rascal sent me a box of roses with a note in it asking me to go to dinner with him tonight."

Even in the lower priced grades you will notice the same superb fit. And the faithful and skillful work that produces fine clothes.
