Character of Napoleon III.

It his intellect was of a poorer quality than men supposed it to be at the time of the Anglo-French alliance, it was much above the low guage which people used to assign to it in the earlier period, which began in 1836 and ended at the close 1861. That which had so long veiled his eleverness from the knowledge of mankind was the repulsive nature of the science at which he labored. Many men before him had suffered themselves to bring craft to polities. Many more, toiling in humbler trades, had applied their cunning and skill to the conflicts which engage courts of law ; but no living man, perhaps, except Prince Louis Bonaparte, passed the hour of a studious youth and the prime of a thoughtful menhood in contriving how to apply stratagem to the science of jurisprudence. It was not, perhaps, from natural baseness that his mind took this bent. The inclination to sit and sit, planning for the attainment of some object of desi,e-this, indeed, was his nature, but the inclination to labor at the task of mak ing law an engine of decait, this did no come, perforce, with his blood. Yet it came with his parentage. 9 9 9 9 . For years the Prince pursued his strange calling; and by the time his studies were · over he had become highly skilled. Long before the moment had come for bringing his crooked science into use, he had learned how to frame a constitution which would seem to enact one thing and really enact another.

He knew how to put the word "jury" in laws which robbed men of their freedom. He could set the snare which he called "universal suffrage " He knew how to strangle a nation in the night time with the thing he called a "Plebiscite." * * It is believed that men do him wrong who speak of him as void of all ideas of truth He understood truth, and in conversation he habitus ly preferred it to falsehood, but his truthfulness though not perhaps contrived for such an end, sometimes became a means of deception, because, after generating confidence, it would suddenly break down under the pressure of a strong motive. He could maintain friendly relations with a man, and speak frankly and truthfully to him for seven years, and then suddenly deceive him.

A letter from a gentleman in Lee's army thinks it wrong for any of the Southern papers to talk about peace. He says that "that 's not the way to bring a cowardly foe to his senses, and the feeling in the army is adverse to anything that looks like timidity or a want of faith in the success of the cause."

A SOLEMN WAENING TO WIVES -A COTrespondent of the Selma Reporter relates a story which should serve as a solemn warning to the wives of soldiers. He says a few weeks ago a soldier was tried and convicted of the crime of desertion, and sentenced to be shot. The day for the execution arrived and at the appointed hour this brave man, who had fought many battles and endured every kind of hardship, fell a bloody corpse at the hands of his comrades. Upon inquiry it was ascertained he was as true as steel to our cause, and that it was on account of his wife that he deserted. He received a letter from her full of complaints. Looking alone upon the dark side of the picture, she had magmfied her troubles and sufferings and earnestly entreated her husband to return home. He became restless, discontented, unhappy. He ceased to take any interest in the discharge of his military duties, and thought only of how he could get home. His solemn oath never to desert troubled him calling on much and he well knew the crime of desertion had become so frequent in the ar-
