THE GALLANT PELHAM.

From the Houston (Texas) Journal. Where is there a soldier of the old army, who was on the heights of Fredericksburg, but can recollect the hero, young Pelham, fighting his short time ago. A handsome orphan work girl, of admiration ran throughout the army, and the fruit of her honest labor, and had for some great hero, as brave as he was modest, had his months been courted by a young man, a jourreward in the general orders of Gen. Lee, of the neyman hatter. One day the young girl said hanced by the fact that he was the only one longer delay it. A rich lawyer has offered me

Now firing, now retreating, and then returning almost | The lover, highly indignant at the attorney and to the very line of the returning foe-at each discharge a silver line of white would gleam where the line of blue had before stood. It was a grand and terrific sight. We could hear all around the shouts of our men as they cried : "See how he fights. Who is it? What a soldier! It is Pelham!" and cheer after cheer of the feld, he fought until nearly every horse be had was killed, and the men torn to fragments by shot and shell. Then we understood Stonewall Jackson's and A P Hill's corps, and brave?" This compliment brought from him fined in one cage.

glistening in patriotic circles over his head, and his clear voice cheering up each weary heart to one more honest effort, when a shell burst over his head, and one fragment went hissing through his brow. He fell, and for a moment there was being held in debt by the old hags who import a pause. Stuart for a moment stopped and looked at him, and said in a solemn tone, the tears trickling from his eyes, "Serving on my staff is fatal-it is fatal."

The following narrative of Harry Gilmore tells the rest of the close of this pure good life :

Gilmore, laid upon his horse and placed in charge of two dismounted men with orders to carry him to an ambulance and call a surgeon. Col. Gilmore thus relates in his book, entitled and brutal treatment of one of the noblest spirits that perished for the "Lost cause."

"On my way to Culpepper, I overtook, near Brandy Station, the two men I had placed in charge of Pelham, making their way back to Culpepper, with the body across the horse, just as they had started from the field of battle, his head and hands hanging down on one side, his legs on the other-face, hair and hands soaked and clotted with mud and blood.

"Overwhelmed with horror, I had him laid on the grass in the fence corner, and then, to my astonishment, found him still alive. Imagine my indignation and vented wrath, when I found that instead of looking for an ambulance, they had moved toward Culpepper, a distance of eight miles, four of which they had already accomplished. I firmly believe that had surgical aid been called to remove the compression on the brain, his life might have been saved.

"An ambulance was immediately sent for him, and by the time I had dispatched my business with the telegraph, Pelham had arrived in town, and was at once conveyed to Bessie's home, been washed with warm water, his feet and hands swathed in flannel, and some brandy poured in his mouth, the surgeons commenced the first architects in the country. He made a relieving the compression on the brain. About 1, p. m., his eyes opened-he turned toward me with an unconscious look-closed them-drew a long breath, and died without a struggle. We dressed him in his best uniform, and had but just laid him on the bed, when the door was gently opened, and Stuart entered, having returned from the fight at Kelly's Ford. Great tears rolled down his cheeks as he silently gazed on the lifeless form, and then retired.

"Exhausted with fatigue, I lay down upon the floor, and slept soundly beside the mortal until you can pay for new ones. field that morning in usually fine spirits; but such is the fortune of war."

Thus, indeed, perished a great and good lad. He was carried to his home in Alabama, and buried beneath her loved soil. In Richmond his body lay in state, and the ladies of the doomed city not only covered his coffin with wreaths of evergreens, immortelles and pure white roses, to designate the purity of his life, but they paid to the form-sous peur, sans reproche—the tribute of their tears. Everywhere on the way he was greeted with funeral honors, and the noble heart of Pelham passed into history as the type of that pure chivalry that glowed in the hearts of the youths of the army, and the loss of whom hath caused much mourning throughout the South.

OUR FORTUNE TELLER.

As a great many well meaning but over curious young people, unwilling to await the untain hand of time, are throwing away their stamps upon imposters who pretend to be astrologists and readers of the future through the medium of the stars, we have thrown into a coudensed form the whole theory of the art of fortune telling, by the careful study of which any lady or gentleman can become a proficient.
