

CONNECTICET.

The following lines were written by the late High Peters, on leaving Connecticut in 1829. They purport to have been penned on board the steam-boat in Leng Island Sound as she here him from his native land. The prophetic sigh, "you see your home no more" has been verified. He was buried at Cinciunati in 1832." "My native land good night."- Byron

The boat swings from the pebbled shore,
And proudly drives her prow;
The orested seas roll up before
You dark grey land—I see no more.
How sweet thou seemest now! Thou dark grey land, my native land,
Thou land of rock and pine,
I'm speeding trein thy golden sand—
But can I wave a farewell hand
To such a shore as thine?

P've gazed upon the gilded cloud
Which shades thine em'raid sod;
Thy hill, which Freedom's share hath ploughed,
Which nurse a vace that hath not bowed
Their knee to aught but God—
Thy mountain floods, which proudly fling
Their waters to the fall—
They hirds which cut with raphing wing— Thy birds which cut with rushing winghe sky that greets thy coming spring, And thought thy glories small.

But now ye've sunk to yon blue line
Between the sky and see,
I feel, sweet home, that floor art mine,
I feel my besom cling to thine—
That I am part of thee.
I see thee hiended with the wave,
As children see the earth
Close up a sainted mother's grave;
They weep for her they cannot save,
And feel her holy worth. Thou mountain land-thou land of rock,

I'm proud to call thee free; Thy sons are of the Paigrim stock, And nerv'd like those who stood the sheek, At old Thermopyles, se laurel wreaths their fathers wan, The children wear them still: Proud deads these iron men have done— They fought and won at Hannington, And bled at Banker Hill

There's grandeur in the lightning's stroke There's grandour in the lightning's stroke.
That rives the mountain ash.
There's beauty in the giant cak,
And rainbow beauty in the smoke.
Where crystal waters dush.
There's music in thy winter blast,
That sweeps the hollow clen:
Less sturdy men would shrink aghast.
From piercing winds like those thou hast.
To nurse thine iron men.

And thou hast gens—aye, living pearls,
And thowers of Eden hue;
Thy involvest are thy bright-eyed garls,
Of farry forms and selfu curls,
And smites like Herr con's dew;
They've hearts like those they're born to wed,
Too proud to nurse a stave;
They'd accorn to share a monorch's bed,
And somer lay their angel head,
Deep in the humble grave.

And I have left thee, home alone,
A pilgrim from thy throne:
The wind goes by with hellow moon,
I hear it sigh a warning tone—
"You see your home no more."
I'm east upon the world's wide sea,
Torn like an ocean weed—
I'm east away, far—far from thee,
I feel a toing I cannot be—
A brussed and broken reed.

Farewell-my native land, farewell! Farewell—my native land, farewell!
That wave has hid thes now—
My heart is bound as with a spell—
This rending pang! Would I could tell
What ails my throbbing brew?
One look upon that feding strenk
Which bounds you eastern sky!
One tear to cool my norming cheek.
And then a word I cannot spenk—
"My native land—Good live?"

He was and in a high degree interesting. Ho was but partially concated and but obscurely brought up; yet no man was ever more at ease in the polished ranks of life than he. Not that he had at all conformed to their artificial rules and title etiquette, but that he observed the dictates of natural good he conserved the dictates of natural good he into the sense and good humor. His interview with the King at Windsor is mentioned as highly interesting. His Majesty asked the stout hearted mountaineer, if they had any newspapers in America! "But very few, and these are but little read," was the answer, "How then, asked the King, "do the common people know of these grievances of which they complain, and of which we have just been speaking?" "As to that," said he, "I can tell your Majesty, that amongst a people who have felt the spirit of liberty, the news of oppression is carried by the birds of the air and the breezes of heaven." "That is too figurative an answer from a matter of fact man, to a plain question," rejoined the King. "Well, to be plain," answered the rebellious subject, "among our people the tals of wrong is carried from man to mon, and from neighborhood to neighborhood, with the speed of electricity; my countrymen feel nothing else; out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." I will add with great respect to your Majesty, that such a people cannot be put down with the sword.

The King made a long pause, as if strongly impressed with the truth of this remark At length, changing the subject, he asked Col. A. if he knew Dr. Franklin; and being answered in the affirmative, inquired con cerning his experiments with electricity and expressed a currently to experience an electric shock. The british sovereign seemed to take pleasure in the conversation, which he kept up for more than on hour and at length made Col. Allen promise to visit him, with his countryman, Dr. Franklin, at his palace in London. Some weeks after this, he was reminded of his promise by the nobleman above mentioned, and an ur was fixed for the homebred philosopher of America to explain the novsterios of a new discovery in science to the Royal Family. They seconded accordingly, and with n apparatus chiefly of his own invention. Dr. Franklin exhibited many of those semple and amusing experiments, for which he was so noted, and at which the royal children, even those of a larger growth, were The much delighted.

In this playful way, Dr. Franklin took occasion to convey instructions as to the properties of this astorishing fluid. While royal imintation was thus in a most unkingly uproar, the Fremer was announced as in waiting. The King seemed as a monitoring. The King seemed as a monitoring.
