NORAH'S DEVOTION.

"Ah, how pretty she is!" he said .-'Was there ever such a pretty lass, d'ye think, Norah ?"

"Perhaps not," said Norah; and she took her milking palls, and followed May, who went on before with a light step and a gay song toward the meadow, where the cows browsed. But when she was quite out of hearing of Ned Will the water rise so far?" she asked. "Shall I be drowned—I who was to be married te-morrow? Oh, it can't be, Wilton, sitting perched upon the stile, Norah!" she muttered to herself, "pretty! pretty! "Others will go with pretty! Ah, they ring the changes upon that, these men, as the old bell-"But no other besi upon that, these men, as the old bellringer that knew but his one tune used to do, down in the church tower. Pretty! pretty! pretty! It's never 'good,' it's never 'honest,' it's never 'true.'
It's always 'pretty.' Then she stopped and looked up, and said, with a quiver of passionate grief in her voice, "Oh, I'd give the world just to hear Ned Wilton call me pretty! What a fool I am!"

And May knew the whole, and triumphed over Norah, and cared a little, not much, for Ned, because of his broad shoulders and brown curls.

The girls slept together in an upper room of the house, and on the wedding eve, May spread out gown and shoes and cheap white veil, and, dancing about them, boasted that when the morrow's sun set she would be mistress of the house, and Norah her servant, and who begged her not to lose so good a. place, said nothing, but stood silent, pale-faced and wan, and felt a bitter hate rising in her heart.
