

Sunday Reading.

The Electioneering Campaign.

We are in the eye of another season of political excitement. The elections for the State and the Nation are beginning to occupy a prominent place in the thoughts, in the conversations, and in the actions of the American people.

It becomes each one, then, to consider well before he is again involved in the exciting whirlpool of political strife.

God forbid that the Holy Sanctuary should be desecrated by being made a place for the holding of political meetings.

THE SCRIPTURES.

Whether we consider the depth and compass of the disclosures of the lively oracles of God—the distinctness and clearness of their information—the certainty and truthfulness of what they reveal—or their universality and adaptation, together with their character of invariableness and immutability, we must confess that they are altogether unique and unrivalled.

THE SABBATH.

Two men set out on a journey of several hundred miles; on their way, the same road together. Sunday morning one of them saddled his horse and trudged on; the other remained and took rest.
