Mr Calhoun's reply a few weeks afterwards, elicited a prompt and spirited rejoinder, with which every American citizen is familiar as a specimen of rare terseness, and indignant repudiation of an adversary's insinuations ventured upon in the absence of that courage which would have made a direct charge.

In the spring of 1839 Mr. Webster visited England, Scotland and France. In England especially he was received with cordiality, and treated with respect and honor, to an extent probably never before manifested to a private, unofficial visiter. In 1840 he gave himself up for months to the promotion of Gan. Harrison's election. When General Harrison succeeded to the Presidency, he promptly sought counsel from Mr. Webster, offering him any post in the Cabinet he might choose, and asking his advice as to whom he should select for the other members. Mr. Webster became Secretary of State, and set himself earnestly to the adjustment of the pending disputes.

At this crisis came an unexpected blow. President Harrison was removed by death. Mr. Tyler stepped into the vacant post .-The Cabinet remained in office, and it is well understood that the active management
