Poetry.

FOR THE N. C. WHIG.

TO HIS J. —
See the poem above.

Forget the weavers of the past,
Sweet in your eyes,
And share the life that flows as best
With things you really love.

Here long poems in prospect first—
In my own early years,
When I was young and gay,
I've been so true to you.

No more will sing the Levite's song,
Nor tell the people's wrong,
Nor meet the clank of iron hoofs,
Or listen to the wailing of the poor.

No more will I strive to win the love,
That is the goal of every eye,
But I will strive to win the love,
That is the goal of every eye.

And there a fairer virgin's hand,
Will be the goal of every eye,
And there a fairer virgin's hand,
Will be the goal of every eye.

But off as memory comes now
The scenes of the past,
I'll leave you to your own,
I'll leave you to your own.

'Tis well to have a friend who
Will share the life that flows as best
With things you really love,
With things you really love.

And if you find me faithful
I'll be true to you as best
I can, I'll be true to you as best
I can, I'll be true to you as best.

Not all the stars are shining
Not all the stars are shining
Not all the stars are shining
Not all the stars are shining.

she busied herself repairing her husband's clothes and making her home comfortable, as every good wife would do. John told her that he would remain in the woods for some time, and that she should not expect to see him for some time.

"To be sure!" answered John, impatiently. "Don't interrupt!"

"Sophronia knew that her husband was in the chestnut branch, above the reach of the wolves; but still she had her fears. A branch might break—John's foot might slip, and the hungry pack seize him with their jaws before he reached the ground, or even should he escape them—and John was too cautious and self-possessed to be caught falling from a tree—he might be unable to shoot one half of them, and be kept in the tree all night; all the cold night."

"Margaret shivered."

"As long as Sophronia could hear the reports of his rifle, it seemed that he was near her, and alive; but when a long interval elapsed, and there was no more firing, she started in fear, and making out of the house, shouted, 'John, John!'"

"What is the matter?"

"Veranda; and he told his wife that he had used up all his bullets, and that there were dozens of wolves around him. As for that matter Sophronia could see that the ground was covered with them; dark objects moving about on the white surface of the ground, fighting, growling and jumping up against the tree in their rage of fanaticism. Occasionally one of the pack would utter a low and dismal cry, which would be answered in different directions, far off in the woods."

"Do go into the house," shouted John. "I am safe, and you can do nothing for me. You will freeze to death, besides, wolves are prowling about you, and they will be upon you before you think of it. I may have to stop all morning, but don't let it disturb you. Go to bed and sleep if you can."

"What! he was shouting a pauper wolf came leaping toward Sophronia, followed by others of the pack. Terrified, she fled into the house just in time to shut the door and listen long and hard, but she came up with an angry snarl and growl, which made her blood curdle in her veins."

"She did not venture to open the door again; and as there were no windows in the direction of the tree in which her husband had taken refuge, she could not keep up with him any communication. So she sat patiently as she could for the night, the fire in the stove burning away, the flames falling over the hearth, and the ashes turning to cinders, and the wolves howling."

"Well, after a great while—and it was the longest night Sophronia ever knew—the first streak of dawn stole into the house, and found the poor woman sleeping in her chair. It was the first slumber she had enjoyed; and when after her watching and night she awoke, she was so tired, that she lay down again, and slept until the sun was high in the sky, and the wolves were gone—daylight streamed through the windows, and all was still around her."

"It took Sophronia a minute to collect her faculties and realize the terrors of the night; then remembering her husband, she flew to the door to see if the wolves were departing. Not one was to be seen; the field was clear, and the silence frightened her."

"Why was she frightened? I should have thought she would be glad to find the wolves gone."

"She was frightened, child, because, although nothing now hindered John's coming to the house, he had not appeared. The wolf thought that he had fallen, and been eaten by the monsters, and she was looking for him, and she could not see him."

"She thought that he had fallen, and been eaten by the monsters, and she was looking for him, and she could not see him."
