FAITH AND PRACTICE.

The religious fidelity of two Christians was observed to be very diverse and unequal...

quicker feelings, and more sensitive nature combine to bring their grief more fully to the observer's eye...

But man has less sympathy with man; and besides, when he suffers, his stern, hard outer mail is not so pliable as to yield easily...

Therefore as life stings and at the same time calls to duty, he must toil and buffet his billows and smile too on occasion...

Both alas, in this mystic life, must do and suffer, and for both, God and their own loneliness and tears must ever be the best consolation...

Agricultural.

THE GARDEN.

Men used to large operations in the field are apt to neglect, and often to despise, the petty processes of the garden...

One for a little time accustomed to what I may call the domestic scenery of the old world, is struck with the baldness and homeliness, and poverty of delicacies, about the majority of our New England farm houses...

The merchant may erase the record of his notes and obligations from his diary but this does not take his name from a single note, or delay for an hour the maturing of his obligations...

This is the idea of Christian duty as expressed by a working Christian. The contrast here presented is the same in theory as in practice, exemplifying the principle that "as he thinketh in his heart so he is."

Justification of freerill, it is often urged, "I am no hypocrite, I make no profession," and with the spirit we have seen the self-evident satisfaction and complacency with which this is said...

To be a hypocrite is to be a fearful thing; but the man who pays such a measure of respect to religion, as to put on its profession as a disguise of his real character, can surely be no worse than the man who avowedly casts away all respect for it...

The plea of justification will bear another interpretation; it exhibits the spirit of all uncharitableness. It is a virtual assertion that all who make profession of religion are hypocrites...

Some of my neighbors, dear Anctor, rejoiced with self-reliance, short crops, and poor horses, about the idea of fall and winter planting, and still pursue the old practice of letting their land lie barren...

This system may answer in very light sandy soil; but where the land is inclined to be close and stiff, it is absolutely barbarous. Under it the land can never be properly broken and brought into the tith.

It is a pity such men cannot see the folly of their course, and adopt the better plan of breaking by times, and of breaking well their land. It should be thrown up in ridges, in time to take the benefit of the pulverizing frosts and freezes of winter...

spring, it should be again closely plowed just before plating, which is equal to half the cultivation.

Put in corn or cotton, after this preparation, and subsequently manage it judiciously, and if it don't yield a third more than under the too common slovenly mode of cultivation, the deficiency may be charged to your humble servant,

SWEET POTATOES.

We are indebted to a friend from Giles county, who is known not only to be a scientific but a practical farmer, for the following mode of raising sweet potatoes, which he assures us is in all things preferable to any other mode now in use.
