In Scotland when you speeze the people say: "God bless you." The idea is you are taking cold and the prayer is meant to avert your lilness. Something like this appears to obtain as a custom in all lands. From the remotest ages the salute has followed the suceze. In a time of pestilence Pope Saint Gregory published a short besiediction to be used as a salute, because the crisis was attended by succeing, and in most cases was then fatal. Aristotle and Pliny write about the custom, but throw little light upon its origin—the former holding that the salute recognizes the succee as emanating from the brain, man's noblest part. In the French academy there is a paper on file describing the custom as common among the Indiana of America, when the country was first discovered.
