Never in the history of this country have the shops displayed more beautiful and gorgeous ma terials and trimmings and never were these materials and adjuncts more costly than at the present time.

Velvet, lace and fur are the materials in which many of the bandomest costumes are developed, and these three materials in beautiful quality are costly; but it is in evening frocks that one finds the tre mendous extravagance of the season most fully illustrated.

For the daytime costume velvets plian, striped, ribbed and embossed are all used, but the more neutral colorings are favored and the marvelously rich color schemes and gor ess are reserved for evening wear. In the costume for day use velvet is very likely to be combined with another material, satin, cloth chiffon, etc., instead of being used alone, and the result of this arrange ment is satisfactory since it makes possible a frock less warm than one entirely of velvet, and if one choose consider practical questions, a frock that will wear better than one entirely of velvet.

For afreet costumes velvet is uner extensively, and frequently in combination with fur. Bands of fur de orate the bottom of skirts, and it the skirt is of the modern slashed variety, the fur hand extends up the aides of the opening. Wisconsin man who probably had the painful experience some other people have had with large anchors in small motorboats has designed a folding anchor. The arms of this implement are pivoted at the bottom of the ahank, which is hollow, and are operated by a rod that runs up inside the shank. When the anchor is not in use, the arms can be folded up along the shank, and the whole take up very little space, besides having the points out of the way, where no one is in danger of running against them. When the anchor is to be lowered, the arms are pushed open and locked in that posttion so firmly that the apparatus is
