July 8, 1843.-228-y. THE HORSE ABATORS, OF PARIS.

Few things are more productive of melancholy than the fate and condition of horses in the latter days of their career. No inalter how useful they may have been, what years of toil they may have endured, we find them at last dismissed without regret, and sold for a few shillings, or what their mere skin, flesh, "" bones, and other parts, are worth. Thus, in . ... Londou, and also in Paris, there are establishments forming the abatoirs of horsesplaces, of course, whence all sentiments of pity are banished, and where the once sleek and beloved animals are deprived of existence, in the midst of scenes which reflect little credit ou humanity.

Few have any idea of the immense extent of the horse abaloirs at Montfaucon in Paris. To this place all horses past service are conducted. Worn usually to skin and bong, they come in strings of twelve or twenty, are hud fled into a stable whore they cannot stir. or left in the open air, tied to the carcasses of those that have just met their fate. A great number of horses living and dead, are brought to Montfaucon annually ; the winter season, when the poor cannot keep them, being most productive in this respect. By a calculation made for 1827, it was found that thirty five came to the slaughter house daily, making a whole of 12,785. Three-fourths of them came in life. As, in the same year, the total number of horses in Paris amounted to about 20,500, not less than five-eights seem then to perish annually. A deduction must be made: however, for the horses bought in the districts around the city. In any case the number of victurs is immense.

Four different methods are used at Montfaucon for killing the horses. One is by injecting air into an open vein, a tedious, and little used though cleanly process ; a second is by piercing the spinal marrow in the neck; a third is to fell the animal on the heed, as is citizens of Fayetteville, that | done with oxen ; and a fourth operation is to stab the animal in the chest. One melancholy sight usually follows the deaths of two or three horses; The stoutest of the victims next to fall, is made to draw the ficely slain bodies to the scenes of their ulterior operations The hair of the mane and tail is removed before death, but the wretched hacks have usually lost or been stripped of these appendages before coming to Montfaucon. When accumulated in quantities, the bair is sold to saddlers and chairmakers. The skins of the When the force and strength of the Tannin is John B. Martin, Smith, Wright, Lyon & Co., Horses are of science have recommended its emhorses are of course sold to Jaupers. Of the ployment in the manufacture of Prussian blue, for which purpose ox blood is in great demand. The flesh is the next point. In 1739, an ordinance was revived interdicting its sale in Paris as human food. During the time. of many who took no other animal food for six months, felt not the slightest injury from it. our said Court of Equity, at office, the last Mon-day in February, 1843, and of the 67th year of The open use of it did not cease till 1803. In 1811, a time of scarcity, many butchers were caught making market of it; and soon ; afterwards, the medical men having declared the flesh of a sound horse wholesome, a per-THE Subscribers, re-siding in Cumberland county, hav-ing had serious losses in their holds good. Any one offending con, they live on nothing else, and they thrive in the above notice, will be dealt with as the law upon it. It perhaps strengthens their nerves for their disagreeable business, as it spirited up our hardy ancestors of the north to their human butcheries. The use of it amongst these latter nations only ceased on their conversion to christianity, as is proved by existing papal bulls. However, Denmark has latterly returned to its old habits, being the first European nation that has authorized the sale of horse flesh among the ordinary contents of the shambles. A traveller relates, also, ho tasted some excellent smoked horse, on diaing with the Tartarian Khan, Krim-Gneral. Baron Larrey, moreover, tells us that the French army, in various campaigns, were not only sustained well by such food, but were even seemingly cured of scorbutic disease. From different parts of animals killed at Montiaucon, glue, oil, and other marketable commodities are produced, and the shoes meet with a ready sale at the cutlers and others .- In short, nothing is lost; for it is even a trade to gather the larvie as food for fowls ; and thus the elegant animals which once pranced proudly in the Champs de Mars and at the gay fetes of the French metropolis, are sent to Montfaucon, and put to the basest of nurposes.
