POETICAL.

Nature and my Heart.

The tend'rest flower bedrenched with rain, Still lifts its head and smiles again When morning light dispels the cloud, Which lately thundered fast and loud, And thon, my heart, be as the flower.

The little stream, with crystal flow, By some rude storm, doth murky grow, And angry rushes, dark and fast, Yet soon will clear and calm at last. And thou, my heart, learn from the stream.

The mighty oak, at winter's blast, Strips off its leaves, and limbs, and mast, And stands a type of mute despair; But blooms again with vernal air, And thon, my heart, be as the oak.

Old ocean's tide, in tempest driven, Lashes the shores and cries to Heaven In fearful woe, in fury wide; But soon is still as nestling tide, And thou, my heart, learn from the sea.

The flower, the stream, the oak, the sea, All have their times of gloom and glee, To them, there comes at last relief, But souls ne'er find solace of grief; Then thou, my heart, learn to submit.

All nature has some fitting balm To heal, renew, refresh or calm. But there are hearts whose ceaseless woe Solace or calm can never know: Then thon, my heart, learn to endure.

Cast up thy gaze from earthly things! Deem sorrow good; to thee it brings Promise of Life when nature dies; For Nature's voice forever cries. Oh, bruised heart, trust God alone!
