Methinks I see thee as thou art, A spirit robed in hues of Heaven. And thus I proudly think of thee, Sweet, gifted child of soul and song:

While fancy paints thee to the mind, The loveliest of earth's brilliant throng. A thousand thoughts of love and thee, Have nestled in my throbbing heart; Thine image haunts me day and night, And will not from mine eyes depart.

A Grecian artist once, we're told, With pencil dipped in golden beam; Painted a sleeping Nymph beside The margin of a quiet stream. And round that pictured form he threw

Such life-like charms of heavenly grace, That all, who saw it, thought her soul Was speaking from her angel face. Pilgrims from Greece and Corinth came, From Sparta and from rugged Thrace, To gaze upon that sleeping form

So perfect in each matchless grace. Among the rest, from Chio came A gentle youth, with feelings warm; And long he gazed with thought intent, Upon that fair but lifeless form.

Far lovelier than that Venus bright, Is thy sweet image to mine eyes, As o'er my dreamy couch it bends, Like guardian angels from the skies, A purer feeling than inspired That gentle youth from Chio's isle: Would fill my heart could I but dwell Within the sunshine of thy smile.

Fair girl! the harp that feebly sings

The praises of thy charms divine; Is swept by hands that ne'er have felt, The bliss of being clasped in thine. I ne'er have heard thy gentle voice, Save in the winds that float along, And bear to many a grateful heart, The cadence of thy heavenly song.

Sing on sweet minstrel of the West! Let music from thy harp-string flow; Sing sweetest songs of joy and mirth, To cheer the heart oppressed with woe. The charming numbers of thy musc,

Will win for thee a world-wide fame: A crown of love will deck thy brow, And shed a halo round thy name. Sweet cousin! may thy future life,

Be ever fair and bright as now; May hope, with fairy fingers, twine A garland for thy radiant brow, And should the cruel Fates decree, That I shall ne'er thy sweet face sec: Yet long as life and love shall last, A cousin's heart will turn to thee. Mobile, Ala.
