THE NORTH CAROLINIAN, FAYETTEVILLE, N. C.

Written for the North Carolinian. Squire Jugsucker "Judicially Concerned, "

During the summer of 18-, we had occasion to visit several of the towns and villages which dot the surface of the western portion of the State of .

In pursuance, therefore, of this undertaking, we procured a pair of saddle-bags-filled them with bread, meat, clean dickies and other articles "too tedious to mention," and having secured the aforesaid bags to our saddle, we hid good-bye to our friends-raounted "Old Bones" and set forward on our journey. How many days we spent traveling, and how many times we rested on the way it is not our purnose to relate. Nor shall we be very precise as to dates. Hence, in the prosecution of our story, we shall state that late in the afternoon of a certain day, or rather of an uncertain day, ded. we halted at a small farm-house situated near the road-side, and solicited entertainment for "man and heast." Having received assurance from the proprietor of the premises that our wants should be attended to, we committed our four-footed companion in care of a juvenile durkey, and wended our way into the farmer's domicil. Our ablutions performed, and our rected our attention to a side-board and requested us to "take a little something for the stonnach's sake. It won't hart you," he remarked, "for I ain't a boy nor a mule and I've allers found sperits to be one of the best family medicines ever invented-good at all times; (patting his waistcoat with his hand) the right pint."

Now we were not prepared to plead sickness, nor to give full credence to the testimony of our friend in relation to the virtues of the medicine alluded to: nevertheless, we did imbibe a small dose of the "panacea," and found it not very bad to take. Our host, too, helped himself to a "swig." and in a little time thereafter we, together with our hostess, were quietly engaged in dispatching our supper. And as the reader would like, perhaps, to have descriptions of the persons whose guest we were, we shall state for their gratification that our host was of medium height, spare-built, complexion like a "brick," and not less than fifty, Our hostess was not fat, fair nor forty. Enoughsaid on this point-therefore we proceed:

Our repast being ended and the table removed, we re-commenced conversation with our host who seemed to be extremely loquacious, and somewhat vain-glorious. Desirious, however, of putting ourself on good terms with him, we asked, sir, what is your name?

After eving us a moment as if surprised at the question we had propounded, he exclaimed.
