THE DISMISSAL OF CRAMPTON. -The dismissal of Crampton is still a mooted point, and we place very little reliance on the reports which are in circulation respecting it. If it should be done, we do not believe any serious difficulty would grow out of the act. The British Government have admitted that our Government would be instifiable in adopting such a course if Mr Crampton has really violated our neutrality

That he has done so, our Government seem to entertain not a doubt; but the British Government have disclaimed any intention to infringe the law, or to disregard the policy, or not to respect the sovereign rights of the United States. It is insisted, however, by her Majesty's Government, that Mr Crampton has not committed any of the acts imputed to him, thus putting the case on nearly the same footing it would occupy had no apology been made. It brighter by reason of the clouds that have may follow, therefore, that Mr Crampton will temporarily overshadowed them. be dismissed. One thing is very certain: Mr Crampton has rendered himself quite unpopular here, and he would do well to resign and seek other quarters.
