Granch. The olive branch as an emblem of peace, has parted with its significance in the amity existing between the American eagle and the British lion. The classicality of its deep green spray and searlet berries has lost all its appropriateness, since the sturdy spokesman of the deputation of English husbandmen, in addressing Mr D'Israeli said, "Naw doant let us have no war wi' Merica, Muster Duzerly." * Calcutations in Regard to Fodder.

It is a great object to the farmers of Maine to raise a supply of the best kinds of fodder for their stock during the winter. Hay, we all know, is the great dependence-the staple material for this purpose, but there are many other crops which can be raised to advantage among us, and which are very valuable for furnishing food to stock, and thereby saving hav. In order to ascertain the real value of these crops for the purpose above named, it will be necessary to compare the nutritive properties of the several articles with good hay, as the standard. Experiments, and close and careful comparison of the results of many trials, have given the following as the comparative difference between the articles mentioned and good hay. We have published these results before, but we now put them in a tabular form, so as to give the reader an easier mode of comparing them.

100 pounds of hay are equal to 275 pounds of green Indian corn, 442 pounds of rye straw. 164 pounds out straw.

153 pounds pea straw, 201 pounds of raw potatoes,

175 pounds of boiled potatoes, 339 pounds mangel wurtzel;

504 pounds turnips; 54 pounds rye; 46 pounds wheat,

59 pounds oats, 45 pounds peas or beans, 64 pounds buckwheat,

57 pounds Indian corn; 68 pounds acorns,

105 pounds wheat bran. 109 pounds rye bran, 167 pounds wheat, pea; and oat chaff,

179 pounds rye and barley. From this "bird's eye view," it will be easy to calculate the fodder value of any of the above articles which you may raise. For instance, if you have 504 lbs. of turnips, they will give as much nutrition to your cattle as
