> > Not an houri or a goddess was she, yet she was fair, very fair, and many thought her beautiful, but her beanty partook more the nature of the lifty than the rose. Her eyes were blue and rather large which were shaded with long silken lashes that served to temper and subdue the fire that burned there, into a soft, penetrating and melancholly light. Her lips resemble in color softness, and contour, twin rose-bads freshened by the dews of the morning; but there was an expression about them which rosebuds never assumed, for it seemed really that divinty itself slumbered there in that, reseate, etherial bud! Her forehead was high and rather broad-her nose, Grecian-her chin rather tapering and full-her hair fell, not down in graceful ringlets, as does the hair of the majority of the heroines of fiction, but it hung unconfined in waves of auburn softness and beauty over shoulders of slightly colored snow; and her round symmetrical figure, was not deformed by hoops, or other absurdities of the Parisian style of dress-in fact, as I before stated, she was fair, very fair, and some thought her beautiful. She was undoubtedly the fairest, purest and loveliest woman I have ever known, but she was not an angel!

> > There are as pretty women now, 1 venture to presume, as there were when old Abraham entertained angels in his teut: I mean as pretty countenances; but did you ever picture in your mind, dear reader, how very odd an auangel would appear now-a-days in the midst of our fashionable ladies!
