The Cumberland Fair.

We are greatly gratified to state that the fourth annual fair of the Cumberland Agricultural Society was a complete success, notwithstanding the unpropitious omens which had somewhat discouraged the executive committee for sometime previous to the fair. The company present was numerous, the exercises of the occasion varied and attractive, the articles on exhibition highly creditable to the contributors, and the receipts to the society sufficiently abundant to testify that the interest in the association by the people of the county is most decidedly on the increase. We were much pleased to see so numerous an attendance on the part of our friends from every section of the county, as well as from the neighboring towns and contiguous counties, and we only regret that our friends from the country did not contribute to the stock and produce departments as liberally and creditably as they might have done with a little more effort.

In looking through the Farmers' and Mechanics' Department we were struck with the superior quality of some of our agricultural produce and the finish and elegance of many of the specimens of home manufacture. It is scarcely necessary to speak of the excellence of McKeehan's specimens in the vehicle line. They are always of the best finish and most substantial workmanship. We noticed a fine set of Harness from Overly's establishment, manufactured by Mr. John Vaughn; from the same establishment a splendid Saddle with bridle and martingales, both of which articles received well deserved premiums. In the mineral department we found an extremely rich specimen of Copper ore from the Watson mine in Chatham, exhibited by Mr. G. W. Gee. It was by far the richest specimen of ore on exhibition, but was unaccountably overlooked by the mineral committee in the award of premiums.

Mr. Gee also had a number of excellent vegetable specimens from his garden, Egg and Pepper plants &c.

Floral Hall possessed an unusual array of fancy and useful contributions, principally from the ladies, embroderies, household fabrics, baby-clothes, pet—(sometimes known as bachelors' aversions) fancy needle-work of all descriptions, drawings, paintings in oil and water colors, artificial fruit and flowers, &c.

A basket of artificial fruit made by Miss Hannah Kelly seemed to attract general attention and elicited much admiration from the connoisseurs in such matters. The fruit was constructed of resin, so naturally, delicately and beautifully colored as actually to have deceived many persons, who imagined the lemons, oranges, peaches, grapes and plums to be genuine fruit.

The drawings and paintings by Miss Ella Pierce gave evidence of considerable artistic taste and talent. The paintings on glass by Misses McIntyre and McPherson were excellent, as were the crayons and water colors of the Misses Monroe, and also the "Winter Scene" of Miss Sandford.

The pastels and oil paintings of W. J. Myrover attracted much notice. Prof. Hall's paintings were much admired.

In the department of Household fabrics we noticed a number of beautiful quilts, home-made carpeting, blanketing, homespun &c., all of which reflected much credit upon the taste, skill and industry of the ladies. One splendid quilt, made by Miss Flora McNeill, was purchased by Mr. H. M. Crane of New York for $20, and he felicitated himself upon the purchase. Not being upon the "tasting committee," and being denied palpable access to the sweetmeats, confections &c, we are not prepared for any specialties on those subjects; the premium list speaks for them.

Mrs. Wm. Bow had on exhibition a beautiful specimen of the genus lepis, a Maltese Hare, a very rare animal in this country. It was, with great care and difficulty, raised by Mrs. B., and attracted considerable attention. We were presented with a specimen of the paper manufactured at David Murphy's factory from the heretofore useless pulp of the Chinese sugar cane after the juice has been expressed. It makes an excellent wrapping paper, smooth, flexible and strong, and was assessed by Mr. Vink that its manufacture would be both practicable and profitable. But we would never finish the enumeration of interesting specimens should we attempt to describe them all, and we must close our list.

On Thursday there were six military companies in attendance, forming quite a gallant escort for the young ladies ("girls," says somebody, who cringes as in triumphs) of the High School, who marched in procession to the Fair grounds to hear Mr. McRae's address. The fine appearance of the visiting companies was quite an addition to the pleasing features of the occasion, and we hope to see them at each succeeding fair the pleased and gratifying guests of the Society. The Hux Born Band would doubtless have played very well had they performed, but a combination of shrinking modesty (in a horn) with other rare and commendable virtues on the part of some of the corps prevented the prodigies of melody which otherwise might have enchanted the trees and stones in the vicinity.

On Friday the Don Quixotes, under the command of a second edition of the veritable knight of Salamanca, drew a large concourse to the fair grounds, witness a dress parade and marriage ceremony a la barbesque. At roll call much surprise was manifested that so many of our grave and revered seniors of the community should be found in those grotesque ruffs.

The Don's remarks prior to the performance of the nuptial ceremony were distinguished for all the weight, dignity and acuteness which characterized his puissant ancestor, and were most pertinent, practical and poetical.

Not an accident of any kind nor a troublesome occurrence of any character marred the pleasantness of the occasion. May the Society enjoy many such anniversaries.

MR. MCRAE'S ADDRESS.

We greatly regret that Mr. McRae declined to permit the publication of his entire address. It was certainly a most happy effort, abounding with information, useful suggestions, and fine sentiments, couched within in language free from affectation and pedantry, yet choice, terse and most felicitous. We regretted that the character of his profession was such as had precluded the acquisition of much practical information in the various departments of his farmer friends could not therefore expect from him such counsel and suggestions as to the tillage of the soil as other speakers better versed in the experiences and observations of country life could impart.

With much pathos and eloquence he alluded to the good and eminent men of the community who had passed away, leaving the fragrance of their reputations and the "luminous track of their noble examples" by the imitation and imitation of pe-terity. To the memories of Toomer, Henry, Eccles, Strange, Huske, Hybart, Robinson and Dobbin, he paid a brilliant and most eloquent tribute, and impressively urged upon the young men the force and beauties of their examples.

Agriculture, its moral, physical and intellectual charms; its importance as the sneer of nations, the stay and support of the world; its independence and its certainty as compared with other professions, was graphically and beautifully treated. Few better illustrations have we heard than the following:

"As it is independent of all others, so are all others dependent on it. While the lawyer leans for his support upon the client he serves, the physician on the call of his patient, the merchant on the caprice and fashions of his customers, the mechanic on the good will of his employer; while men of art, science and literature—creatures of the breath of man—partake the common destiny; while the politician, embarked in the most unseaworthy craft of all, is on the lookout in all weathers, shifting his sail to catch every popular breeze, is nevertheless often stranded—not infrequently shoaled—sometimes foundered—and many times hauled to, in a dead calm, without wait to wait him to success or woe to rock him to repose—a world Micawber, ever waiting for "something to turn up,"—somebody to turn out that he may turn in. The agriculturist, living in an atmosphere pure and serene, remote from the strife of men, asking only of the bounty of heaven for the 'former and the latter rain' and trusting implicitly that while the earth remains seed time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night, shall not cease; in all the toil and labor of the field, in preparing his ground, in sowing his seed, in rearing his plant, is sustained by that dependence on God which is independence of man."

In concluding this part of his address, he referred to the agricultural beauties and excellencies of the various countries of Europe which he had visited, in the course of which he sketched this beautiful picture:

"Italy, though the sun of her prosperity has long since set, and she may be seen only in the twilight of her ancient glory, is lovely still, with her vine clad hills and her groves of olive. Between Provence, the land of the Troubadours, and the Lake of Geneva, lies a luxuriant and fertile territory, where the picturesque Savoyard lights his toil by his minstrel song. England and Scotland are gardens of beauty. The science of agriculture there is carried to its highest perfection, and the earth yields her abundance and grows richer as she yields. Although the subdivision of landed property in France is so great that there is scarce a motive to improvement, yet the whole land blossoms and gladdens with scientific cultivation.

Between the port of Havre and the capital of luxury and taste and fashion, Normandy, with its vigorous vegetation, its noble breed of horses, its fine old chateaux engraved in ancient forests, its blue horizon and its crystal streams, presents the aspect of an agricultural paradise. Standing once on the top of the steeple of the antique Church which crowns the hill, near the city of Bonn in Germany, with the rugged Drachenfels looming against the horizon, Ebreheisten kissing the setting sun, the tall old spire of the Cathedral of Cologne rising to the clouds, and the intoxicated Rhine, the pride of the "faderland," like a jovial Bacchus, reeling through vineyards of the moellne grape, I counted more than twenty villages in view, embowered in fields of wheat. It was autumn, and the golden grain reflected back the sun's bright rays and spread a halo over the land. I could hear many

"Corfews toll the knell of parting day,"

"The lowing herds wait slowly o'er the lea,"

It was as lovely a landscape as a Praxitelles might worship or a Claude might aspire to paint; and the outburst of my heart was, that the day might come when I might attain to sufficient respectability to be a farmer, and that I might live to behold my own country, by skill and cultivation, adorned and ornamented to exhibit the picturesque and beautiful in scenery like this.

He urged the establishment of Agricultural departments in our Universities, Colleges and Schools; the improvement and extension of the common school system; the proper regulation of slave property; a radical change in the laws relating to the free negro population, and spoke with much force and pertinency respecting the evils which this class of the population inflict upon the people of the State. He brought into review the natural resources which surround us; the mineral wealth which lies unused beneath our feet, and spoke with much severity of the narrow, injurious and suicidal line of policy adopted by the "modern Solons" in our legislature who seem resolved to "isolate and blot out the only established inland market-town on a navigable stream that North Carolina possesses in her borders." He deplored the State's deficiency in energy and self-appreciation. He spoke of the World's Fair in Paris, at which were represented Asia, South America, Africa, all of Europe, the isles of the ocean, and most of the United States, and where he said he had "the mortification to see tobacco, excelling that of all other countries in value, of North Carolina growth and manufacture, pass on an exhibition under the Virginia stamp," while "South Carolina bore of the palm for rice; and the important staple of naval stores presented no feature in the exhibition." It is surprising, he asked, that as our state takes so little interests in making herself known, she should be so unfairly appreciated outside of her limits? He reviewed the achievements of American useful and ornamental science and art, and basing his hopes of our future upon a correct appreciation of Southern institutions by the world, predicted for America, glory, prosperity and permanent peace in the days of the years of many generations yet unborn.

This is but a hasty and imperfect resume of Mr. McRae's admirable address, and we repeat our regret, as well as express that of the Agricultural Society, that he has declined to permit its publication. Prepared as it was between times, during the pressure of professional duties, unreviced and unelaborated, he was unwilling to submit it to public criticism through the press. But its appreciation by the large and intelligent auditory was as hearty as it was deserved, and certainly added to its reputation as a public speaker and a man of very superior talents.

Verdancy and Warning.

A Kentucky merchant for some days at the Astor, says the New York Daily News, was accosted by one of the most "gentlemanly appearing men" to be seen about the marble halls and pictured parlors of that tip-top house, who professed to be his acquaintance and also give him the names of business men and firms in Kentucky. Though he had read the papers and should have been on guard against such "two faced, unbridged comrade," this was such "a nice young man" that he strolled forth with him on Sunday as far as the Atlantic Garden. Here his companion and his confederate, who opportunity afforded, and by a "safe" operation took from him his watch, worth $150, and $100 in money. "Have you a knife about you?" Certainly, Kentucky is never without an article!" "Let me have it, by G— if that damned scoundrel be about these premises, I'll have our watches or his life!" Kentucky waited the return of his friend ten minutes, and then concluded he had been deceived, somewhat ashamed of his verdancy he did not tell of his loss at the Astor, but officer Devoy, a Village attached to the house heard of it mysteriously, and the two sailed out early in the morning on the search. Soon Kentucky thought he saw his man, but Devoy said he must be able to swear to him before he could arrest. "However," said Devoy, "look him full in the face, may be he'll show you."

He did so, and sure enough the nice young man extended his hand exclaiming, "Ah! how are you? That fellow did us out of our watches nicely, eh?" "Well, he did, but you didn't come back with my knife! Couldn't you find the scoundrel? Now bark'ee, Sir, I don't want to prosecute you or expose my own folly and greenness, but I must and will have my watch and money." "Are you a friend to this gentleman?" said sharper, addressing officer Devoy? "Well, yes, sir, I am a sort of a friend," said Devoy, exhibiting a shield official. "Old hell, that's enough!"—I'll give you $100 to let me give you the slip." "No sir; but as this gentleman says he wants his valuables, and you know what they are, let us have them. If he doesn't prosecute or complain, I am done with you." "Come on then," and they took a winding way to some "drinkery" in Pearl street, where the watch and money were restored intact, and drinks all around celebrated the lesson taught Kentucky, and the skill of Devoy as a deceiver.
