The following rules we clip from an exchange paper, and if those who write for the press, would observe them, it would be a great favor to Editors and printers, and would prevent many errors, that often seriously effect the meaning of many a good article. They are reasonable and correspondents should regard them as such :

Mr. Lincoln, the Republican candidate for President, after a protracted incubation, has produced his day evening, was brought before the Mayor, on letter of acceptance, in which he agrees to take the nomination of the Chicago Convention.

His letter is judiciously brief, but lacks clearness on two poin s. in it he says that he shan be careful 'not to violate" the Chicago platform, "or disregard it in any part." its present condition of improvement. Men are not satisfied to pursue the peaceful arts of life for any long period of time. It has been said by a wise Philospher, that a state of war was the natural condition of the human race; without subscribing to that sentiment, yet we must confess that he had good grounds for advancing such a doctrine, what is to be the final result of the redical excited spirit of the age, we cannot predict. It becomes the duty of the wise men of our own land, at least, to endeavor to direct the storm which all must see is inevitable.
