solitude itself, while not a breath stirred over the whole horizon as the great transmutation went slowly on, and the colors ever the land turned from rosy to pink, from pink to orange, orange to red and camson—darkening always as the colors ebbed out like a celestial tide, leaving fragments of scarlet clouds over the heavens, the embers of the fire which nad it the prairie in a time of glory.

There was such a quiet, unspeakable richness in this grand farewell of day-such a terrible redness about the sky at last that one could almost fancy some supernatural phenomenon had occurred, that the sun had gone forever, and left a deep and gory wound across the darkening sky. Night was a relief compared to this dread, lurid fire in heaven—a fire which, like the paintings of the sunset before the deluge, left always an ominous anger in the heavens even when the praires clothed in a blue mist rose over it like water.

We who live on the Atlantic seaboard should be thankful that few such sunsets are witnessed, otherwise the whole population might might fly to the nouse-tops nightly, to the great detriment of tin roofs and water-spouts.
