DEFYING HYDROPHOBIA. The Experience of a Washington Doctor in Pasteur's Laboratory.

Dr. Dudley Morgan, writing from Paris to a friend, says: "I was led from my daily routine of hospital clinics to the laboratory of Mr. Pasteur, principally by the desire to see how some of my fellow countrymen were faring under the treatment of the well known savant. This one visit served only to give me an idea of his treatment and to kindle a desire to become more familiarized with what then seemed mere speculation. It is only after many visits that one can claim a knowledge of the subject and the short description which follows

From the spinal cord of this last rabbit, he takes small bits of marrow and suspends them in little flasks, in which the air is kept perfectly dry by caustic potash. The atmosphere of these flasks, which is dry and kept at a constant temperature, has a weakening effect upon the virus, and, in proportion to the number of days, the proportions of marrow are allowed to remain exposed in the flasks, accordingly do they become less virulent. When Mr. Pasteur wished in the different flasks, taking al- li'e study, especially woman, and the peways the marrow which has been ex- culiar derangements to which her delicate time, which is to say twelve to fifteen days, and mixing it, with broth enough for one syringe full, gives the patient his inital inoculation. It is by this gradual and slow process that Mr. $2.50 Pasteus accustoms the system to receive harmlessly the hypordermic injections of the strongest virus or the bite of the most rabid animal.

The bouillon broth of which I have spoken is made in the usual way, only the great precaution is taken that it is perfectly sterile by submitting it to a high degree of temperature for some twenty minutes and then removing the flasks which contain the bouillon and are hermetically sealed to an oven, where the temperature is continued, but at a much less degree. Here they are kept until decanted for the general use of dissolving the marrow, which is then injected by means of a hypordermic syringe into the tissues of the abdo-
