When the parsonage is reached, the cart stops, the pastor comes forth with his little black skull cap on, and a hush falls over the merriment, while the good man returns thanks for the bounty of the harvest, and craves a blessing upon its use.

Then the gay procession resumes its jollity and its line of march towards its destination. The whole day, and often two, are given up to merrymaking and feasting, for which many hands have been busy for days preparing the viands. One evening at least is devoted to dancing. Some large, airy barn is selected as a ballroom. The floor is swept, the walls, the hay-mows, and stalls of the cattle are profusely decorated with boughs of the linden and oak, relieved by bouquets and garlands of bright flowers. The girls bring forth the treasures of their wardrobe, and appear with bright kerchief fastened tastefully over their tightly braided flaxen locks, or with an immense stiff black bow attached to the back of the head, as taste or custom dictate. Often a bodice is worn over a full, light waste, and these, with the bright colored short petticoats, made of heavy woolen stuff, add greatly to the pictures-queness of the whole scene.
