Success with Sage.

The lady who inquired about the cultivation of sage should purchase a paper of English broad-leaf seed of some reliable grower. I prefer the broad-leaf as it less apt to run to seed. Prepare a bed for the seed wi'h a few spadefus from the surface of the hen yard, and mix that with the dirt in the seed-bed thoroughly. When the plants are large enough transplant in rows 18 in. apart. Pineh off the buds when they appear; if allowed to go to seed it is injurious to the plant. When the leaves are large enough, pick or cut them off and spread in a dark warm room. The sooner it dries the better it is. When dry place in air-tight bag. Before a min it is well to throw a spadeful of hen manure about the plants.

Manure taken from the surface of the vard is best as it isn't so strong. -New England Homestead

Fight With A Rattle Snake.

Fayetville, Observer, July 18.

Mr. Bob Godwin, of 71st, had a thrilling experience last week, which almost cost him his life. It was a desperate battle with a rattle snake. It all came about from an account in the Observer last summer of the capture of a large rattler in 71st. A northern naturalist read the account and wrote to parties in 71st, offering a reward for the capture of one alive. So when Mr. Godwin, as he was crossing a stream one day last week, heard a warning rattle and saw a blunt shaped head rear itself up from a clump of bushes, he made preparations to secure the prize. He cut a stick with prongs at the end like a juvember and tied a stout string with a running noose above the prong so that it would not slip off, and then cast this improvised lasso. He caught the snake around the neck the first whirl and began drawing him in. But to his horror the snake began coiling its body around his legs, coil upon coil, until it had reached his waist. Godwin tried to keep the snake's head from his body with the stick, but to no purpose, the serpent bending it like so much rubber until its fangs were almost touching his face. Mr. Godwin then grabbed it around the neck and by a superhuman effort kept it off for several minutes when it gradually relaxed its hold and dropped to the ground dead. Mr. Godwin says that he was benumbed from head to foot after the battle, and that it was several minutes before circulation was restored. The snake was five feet nine inches long, and had eleven rattles.
