Commissioner's Sale of Land.

By virtue of an order of the Superior Court of Alamance county, made in a special proceeding, where all the heirs-at-law of the late Hannah Moore and Mary A. Moore, and the administrators of said late Hannah Moore for partition, and of said Mary A. Moore for partition, all of said lands being in Alamance county, I will offer at public sale, to the highest bidder, on the premises, to-wit: the premises of said late Hannah Moore in Norton township, said county, on Thursday, December 23, 1909.

DECEMBER 23, 1909.
At 10 o'clock noon, the following real estate, to-wit:
A tract of land containing about 80 Acres, and known as the Andrew Moore place and was devised by him to Hannah and Mary A. Moore, and upon which they had their home, and this place has some buildings and improved lands upon it and is a valuable tract of land.

Bill's
Sunbonnet
He Thought It Was Kate
Who Wore It, but It Wasn't.
By BELLE MANIATES.
Copyright, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

It was morning in Idaho, and the sun was beaming pleasantly upon Barry Vall as he rode alongside the big irrigating canal that he had been sent to inspect.

"Many settlers on the reservation, Jim?" he asked the foreman.
"They are coming now that they see the canal is a go. The nearest one is Judge Rand. His shack's up yonder. He's in luck. We go right through his ranch."

Judge Rand! Vall wondered if it could be the same man he had known long ago. He concluded it was not possible.
"Which way do I take to his ranch?" he asked.

"He's generally clearing sagebrush this time of day. Follow the canal and you'll likely run on him."
Vall rode on, tilting his sunbrella back and humming a love tune. He was in a contemplative mood this morning, and the word "Rand" carried him back to the east, where he had been born and bred, but whose dust he had shaken from his feet five years before. At that time he had been in love with Kate Rand, an imperious, self-willed girl. One fateful day she had announced her intention of going to a masquerade in the character and dress of a page. His young, conservative scruples were horrified. He objected, and when she persisted in carrying out her intention his detestable attitude moved him to break the engagement. Immediately afterward he secured an appointment as civil engineer in the west. Later his love affair viewed at long range appeared a very boyish affair.

When he came upon the solitary figure digging doggedly at a resisting root he recognized the man who had come so near being his father-in-law. There were mutual recognitions of pleasure, and then the Judge explained that he had been caught in the financial coil of Wall street and had lost all his worldly possessions.
"Just enough left," he said, "to make a payment on 100 acres here, which I shall put to rest. The spirit of the west has caught me. Barry, I wouldn't go back into Wall street purgatory for any consideration."

After Vall had related his own experiences and inquired after the fortunes of mutual friends he asked almost sheepishly:
"Did Kate come out here with you?"
The Judge was silent for a moment. Then he said, with a sigh:
"Can you picture Kate in the primitive life? She had an opportune invitation to accompany some relatives on a trip abroad."

"And you live out here alone?" exclaimed Vall pityingly.
"No. I have my helper, Bill. We are very comfortable—a little shack for a living room and dining room combined, two sleeping tents and an out-of-door oven—a place for these parts. But Vall was not listening. His attention was concentrated on a slender figure that was approaching in the distance. The figure was clad in khaki trousers, blue shirt, a red kerchief and a sunbonnet.
"Who in the world is that?" he asked.
The Judge turned hastily and looked confused.

"Oh, that's Bill! I want him to go to the next ranch on an errand for me. Excuse me a moment. I will be back."
He hastened toward the sunbonnetted figure, and after a moment's conversation the figure turned and went the way from which it had come.
"Your Bill doesn't look equal to much hard work," observed Vall dryly.
"Bill's all right at farm work or housework," assured the Judge, "but try, willing, enduring for the best of all, intensely interested in the development of the ranch."

her as Miss Rand and avoided all allusion and reference to the past. He was glad it was to be this way. He wanted to begin acquaintance anew with this womanly Kate.
"You must stay to supper. That's what they call the meal out here. I shall prepare it myself tonight."
"Don't you generally prepare it?" he couldn't help asking.

"No," she said casually. "Bill, the help, cooks, but he is away."
Vall decided to accept the little fiction regarding Bill, and when the Judge came home and was informed by his daughter that Bill had been called away for two weeks, which was just the length of time Vall was to be in the vicinity, he never changed expression.

"Ruth," said the Judge in reply.
"Ruth!" interrupted Vall in surprise.
She smiled.
"Father calls me by my middle name since we came out here. It was my mother's name, and he thinks I am growing to be like her."

After supper, when the Judge and Vall had smoked and chatted, a neighbor came to talk planting to the Judge. Barry proposed to Ruth (as he now liked to think of her) that they ride down the course of the canal, and she readily accepted. He remembered how well she used to ride and how well her boyish slowness looked in the saddle. But never in city parks could they have had this glorious canter over the wind swept way on the open plains. They came back in the glory of a western moonlight. When near the shack Barry drew rein.

"Darling," he said impetuously one night after a long silence, "can you forget the past and my boyish superiority? Can you learn to love me again, Kate?"
"Dear," she replied in a low tone. "That was what I wanted to ask you to do."

For the next two weeks every moment he could snatch from his work Barry spent at the shack. Feeling that he was depriving the Judge of Bill's help, he put in some effective work on the ranch. In his rides, walks and talks with Ruth Ruth felt a sense of optimism. He had never known when with the Kate of olden days.
"Darling," he said impetuously one night after a long silence, "can you forget the past and my boyish superiority? Can you learn to love me again, Kate?"

"Don't!" she cried breathlessly. "I am not Kate!"
He looked at her in bewilderment.
"I am Kate's younger sister. I was away at school when you knew her, but I used to love to hear about you from father. I didn't know at the first that you mistook me for her. Afterward—well, I was afraid you would not care for me, but you can't have her. She's engaged."

"Dear," he said gently, "I don't want Kate. I want you, whether you are Kate, Ruth or Bill!"
"Bill!" she interrupted faintly.
"I knew," he laughed. "Bill's sunbonnet gave him away."

Stream of Life.
Life bears us on like the current of a mighty river. Our boat at first glides down the narrow channel, through the playful murmurings of the little brook and the windings of its grassy borders. The trees shed their blossoms over our heads; the flowers on the banks seem to offer themselves to our young hands; we are happy in hope, and our hearts eagerly at the beauties around us; but the stream hurries on, and still our hands are empty. Our course in youth and manhood is along a wider and deeper flood, amid objects more striking and magnificent. We are animated by the moving pictures of enjoyment and industry pictures of contentment and prosperity before our eyes; we are excited by some short-lived and striking and magnificent. ALL SORTS OF ROADS
Forty-seven Kinds in a Mile Near Ithaca, N. Y.
BUILT IN 100 YARD SECTIONS
Work of the Department of Agriculture and Cornell University—Designed to Give Data on Highway Construction.

Forty-seven different sorts of road to the mile seems a pretty large order, but that is the sort of construction that the road office of the department of agriculture has been undertaking in New York state. It is a large piece of work and promises to give some of the most valuable comparative data on roadmaking that have ever been accumulated in the United States.

The work is to be done in conjunction with Cornell university and will be on a stretch of well traveled highway outside of Ithaca. The materials for the construction have all been accumulated, and the work has attracted much attention. The road will be divided into sections of 100 yards each, and each of these will be built of different material and in a different manner. The road office made plans for the construction of telford and macadam sections, and these will be given a top dressing of almost every conceivable sort of road binder. The roads will be coated with asphalt, different sorts of tar, light and heavy oils and such other binders as have been brought to the attention of the department from various sections of the world.

There will be roads constructed of slag, granite and various sorts of rock, and these will be combined with different sorts of top dressings tending to form a good chemical combination for preserving the surface from wear. It is expected that the road will be finished before the coming of cold weather, and the first report on its wearing qualities will be made early next spring. From that time on there will be periodical inspections and reports, so that the department will know just how the various sections are standing up to the work. All of this is possible, and a record will repair as possible, and a record will be made of the cost of the work, so as to give not only the original cost of building, but the annual cost of upkeep.

The cost will be calculated for the various materials used, both with and without including the transportation charges, so that it will be for any community to tell just what a certain sort of road ought to cost in its own vicinity.

The department has so far decided upon the sort of roads to be built on about 4,200 feet of the experimental stretch, and the whole work probably will cover about a mile. One of the essential features of the periodical reports that will be made will be how the different sections withstand different sorts of traffic. It has been found that some of the best roads, where iron tired vehicles and horses are used are the poorest in withstanding the scouring effect of rubber automobile tires. One great object of the various sorts of binders to be experimented with is to find something that will make a permanent dustless highway and one that will not be disintegrated by motor traffic.

The experiments of the road office with what it terms "palliative" dressings have been quite wide in the past season and tolerably satisfactory. The stretch of road laid in the agricultural department grounds and treated with wood pulp sulphite liquor has stood up quite well, but it is found that it will require about two dressings per year to keep the road in good condition. As the liquor now costs more than light oil for road dressing it seems not to be an economical material to use.

ENDOCARDITIS.
Forms and Dangers of This Affection of the Heart.
By "endocarditis" is meant an inflammation of the endocardium or membrane lining the cavities of the heart. It is caused by the presence of poisonous material, usually of living germs, in the blood and is therefore most often associated with or a consequence of some general disease, such as rheumatism, typhoid fever, scarlet fever, diphtheria or pneumonia.

There are the usual two forms found in most diseases, acute and chronic, the last following upon the first, and there are also the more important divisions into simple and malignant endocarditis. In the simple kind the lining membrane of the heart presents numerous points of inflammation—little red areas with a tuft or ball of fibrin, or clotted blood, in the center. These inflamed spots are not large, and the clots attached to them are also small in the simple form. But in malignant endocarditis the area inflamed is much more extensive, and the clots are larger, sometimes almost filling the cavity of the heart. In some cases of malignant endocarditis, then called ulcerative endocarditis, the inflammation is so acute as to cause ulceration of the affected parts.

The dangers of endocarditis are twofold—danger to the heart itself and danger to the brain or lungs or one of the other organs of the body. The danger to the heart is from injury to one of the valves. This almost always happens except in the mildest form of endocarditis, because the inflammation most often affects the edges of the valves. Even when the disease subsides without giving any sign of valvular injury at first, this often appears later through a fibrous thickening or scarlike contraction of the part originally inflamed. This interferes with the complete closure of the valve, and the result is a heart permanently crippled by valvular disease.

When there is actual ulceration of the valves injury is inevitable. The danger to the brain or other organ is from detachment of the little blood clot from the inflamed spot and its carriage into the general circulation, where it plugs one of the smaller arteries. If this happens in the brain it gives rise to symptoms of apoplexy. The first principle of treatment is absolute rest in bed, and this inaction must be insisted upon long after the patient feels well and is well, and for the rest of life anything that may cause heart strain must be carefully avoided.—Youth's Companion.

His Nose For News.
A cub reporter on a Pennsylvania paper was sent out by the city editor to get a story on the marriage of a young society girl and a man well known in the city. The "cub" was gone about an hour and then returned and went aimlessly over to his desk, by which he sat down. Shortly afterward the city editor noticed his presence and his evident idleness.

"Here, kid!" shouted the superior. "Why aren't you at work on that wedding?"
"Nothing doing," replied the boy. "Nothing doing! What do you mean? Didn't the wedding take place?"
"None. The bridegroom never showed up, so there ain't nothin' to write."

Deserted.
"Do you say your husband deserted you?" said the judge to a lady applying for a separation order from her husband.
"Yes, my lord."
"Please tell the court as concisely as you can how he deserted you."
"Two months after we had completed our honeymoon he deserted me because he thought I was extravagant in the matter of getting clothes, and I went home to my people."
"Yes, proceed."
"Well, I waited and waited and waited for him to come and beg me to return to him, and he never did!"—London Telegraph.
