BRYAN THE TRAITOR.

If Mr. Bryan thinks that in resigning his post as Secretary of State and "taking the stump", in opposition to President Wilson's statesmanlike foreign policy, that he will find a willing audience in the American people, he will be badly mistaken.

The people of this country have always had the utmost contempt for ap peace at any price man. That is what William Jennings Bryan is, The American people are through with this collossal faker and coward once and for all.

If Mr. Bryan conscientiously differed from President Wilson who had the other nine members of his cabinet solidly at his back together, with the ninety-five million American people, he should have remained allent and followed, the instructions of his chief. That was the manly thing to do. This is no time quibble over matters of foreigh policy, when the country is unanimous in the support of its Great President of whom it is particularly proud and delights to, honor. What Bryan wants, is for Germany to go on with her assassinations of American people while he keeps up the diplomatic argument until the war is over. In other words, Bryan wants to arbitrate with a murderer, while he is plunging the dagger in his vitals. Germany has the right to sink an enemy Merchant ship, but she has no right to sink it, until he enters that ship, takes off the valuable papers, and gives the passengers and crew time to disembark in the life boats. Germany did not do this in sinking the Lusitania, and she there.ore violates the laws of civilized nations, laws to which she has consented, and therefore (remany stands to-day as a lawless and barbarous nation, and Mr. Bryan proposes to acquiesce in these barbarities and make the United States Government the laughing stock o' the world. The kingdom o' ancient Poland believed in peace at any price, and when Russia, Austria and Prussia proposed to carve it up and divide it among themselves in 1773 there was nothing left for poor Poland to do but submit. That is evidently the kind of country Mr. Bryan thinks he is living in the
